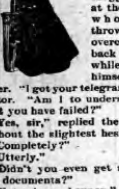
CHAPTER I.



THE managing editor of the New York Argus sat at his desk with a deep frown on his face, looking out from under his shaggy eyebrows at the young man who had just thrown a huge fur overcoat on the back of one chair, while he sat down himself on another. "I got your telegram," began the editor. "Am I to understand from it that you have failed?"

"Yes, sir," replied the young man, without the slightest hesitation.

"Completely?"

"Utterly."

"Didn't you even get a synopsis of the documents?"

"Not a hanged synop."

The editor's frown grew deeper. The ends of his fingers drummed nervously on the desk.

"You take failure rather jauntily, it strikes me," he said, at last.

"What's the use of taking it any other way? I have the consciousness of knowing that I did my best."

"Um, yes. It's great consolation, no doubt, but it doesn't count in the newspaper business. What did you do?"

"I received your telegram at Montreal and at once left for Burnt Pine—most outlandish spot on earth. I found that Kenyon and Wentworth were staying at the only hotel in the place. Tried to worm out of them what their reports were to be. They were very polite, but I didn't succeed. Then I tried to bribe them, and they ordered me out of the room."

"Perhaps you didn't offer them enough."

"I offered them double what the London syndicate was to pay them for making the report, taking their own word for the amount. I couldn't offer more, because at that point they closed the discussion by ordering me out of the room. I tried to get the reports that night, on the quiet, out of Wentworth's valise, but was unfortunately interrupted. The young men were suspicious, and next morning they left for Ottawa to get their reports, as I gathered afterward, to England. I succeeded in getting hold of the reports, but I couldn't hang on. There are too many police in Ottawa to suit me."

"Do you mean to tell me," said the editor, "that you actually had the reports in your hands and that they were taken from you?"

"Certainly I had; and, as to their being taken from me, it was either that or jail. They don't mince matters in Canada, as they do in the United States, you know."

"But I should think a man of your shrewdness would have been able to get at least a synopsis of the reports before letting them out of your possession."

"My dear sir," said the reporter, rather angry, "the whole thing covered I forget how many pages of foolscap paper, and was the most mixed-up matter I ever saw in my life. I tried—I sat in my room at the hotel, and did my best to master the details. It was full of technicalities, and I couldn't make it out. It required a mining expert to get the hang of their phrases and figures, so I thought the best thing to do was to telegraph it all straight through to New York. I knew it would cost a lot of money, but I knew, also, you didn't mind that; and I thought perhaps somebody here could make sense of it. I was baffled; besides, I wanted to get the documents out of my possession just as quickly as possible."

"Hem," said the editor. "You took no notes whatever?"

"No, I did not. I had no time. I knew the moment they missed the documents they would have the detectives on my track. As it was, I was arrested when I entered the telegraph office."

"Well, it seems to me," said the managing editor, "if I had once had the papers in my hand I should not have let them go until I had got the gist of what was in them."

"Oh, it's all very well for you to say so," replied the reporter, with the free and easy manner which exists between American newspaper men and their employers, "but I can tell you, with a Canadian jail facing a man, it is hard to decide what is best to do. I couldn't get out of the town for three hours, and before the end of that time they would have had my description in the hands of every policeman in the place. They knew well enough who it was that took the papers, so my only hope lay in getting the thing telegraphed through, and if that had been accomplished everything would have been all right. I would have gone to jail with pleasure if I had got the particulars through to New York."

"Well, what are we to do now?" asked the editor.

"I'm sure I don't know. The two men will be in New York very shortly. They said, I understand, on the Colorie, which leaves in a week. If you think you have a reporter who can get the particulars out of these men, I should be very pleased to see you set him on. I tell you it isn't so easy to discover what an Englishman doesn't want you to know."

"Well," said the editor, "perhaps that's true. I will think about it. Of course, you did your best, and I appreciate your efforts; but I am sorry you failed."

"You are not half so sorry as I am," said Rivers, as he picked up his big Canadian fur coat and took his leave.

The editor did think about it. He thought for full two minutes. Then he dashed off a note on a sheet of paper, pulled down the little knob that rang the district messenger alarm, and when the uniformed boy appeared gave him the note, saying:

"Deliver this as quickly as you can."

The boy disappeared, and the result of his trip was soon apparent in the arrival of a very natty young woman in the editorial rooms. She was dressed in a neatly-fitting tailor-made costume, and was a very pretty girl, who looked about 19, but was, in reality, considerably older. She had large, appealing blue eyes, with a tender, trustful expression in them, which made the ordinary man say: "What a sweet, innocent look that girl has;" yet what the young woman didn't know about New York was not worth knowing. She boasted that she could get state secrets from dignified members of the cabinet, and an ordinary senator or congressman she looked upon as her lawful prey. What had been told to her in the strictest confidence had often become the sensation of the next day in the paper she represented. She wrote over a nom de guerre, and had tried her hand at nearly everything. She had answered advertisements, exposed rogues and swindlers and had gone to a hotel as chambermaid in order to write her experiences. She had been arrested and locked up so that she might write a three-column account for the Sunday edition of the Argus, of "How Women Are Treated at Police Headquarters." The editor looked upon her as one of the most valuable members of his staff, and she was paid accordingly.

She came into the room with the self-possessed air of the owner of the building, took a seat, after nodding to the editor, and said: "Well?"

"Look here, Jennie," began that austere individual, "do you wish to make a trip to Europe?"

"That depends," said Miss Jennie; "this is not just the time of year that people go to Europe for pleasure, you know."

"Well, this is not exactly a pleasure trip. The truth of the matter is, Rivers has been on a job and has bungled it fearfully, besides nearly getting himself arrested."

The young woman's eyes twinkled. She liked anything with a spice of danger in it, and did not object to hear that she was expected to succeed where a mere masculine reporter had failed.

"Two young men are going across to England on the Colorie. It sails in a week. I want you to take a ticket for Liverpool by that boat, and obtain from either of those two men the particulars the full particulars—of reports they have made on some mining properties in Canada. Then you must land at Queenstown and cable a complete account to the Argus."

"Mining isn't much in my line," said Miss Jennie, with a frown on her pretty brow. "What sort of mines were they dealing with—gold, silver, copper, or what?"

"They are certain mines on the Ottawa river."

"That's rather indefinite."

"I know it is. I can't give you much information about the matter. I don't know myself, to tell the truth, but I know it is vitally important that we should get a synopsis of what the reports of these young men are to be. A company, called the London syndicate, has been formed in England. This syndicate is to acquire a large number of mines in Canada, if the accounts given by the present owners are anything like correct. Two men, Kenyon and Wentworth—the first a mining engineer and the second an expert accountant—have been sent from London to Canada, one to examine the mines, the other to examine the books of the various corporations. Whether the mines are bought or not will depend a good deal on the reports that these two men have in their possession. The reports, when published, will make a big difference, one way or the other, on the stock exchange. I want to have the gist of these reports before the London syndicate sees them. It will be a big thing for the Argus if it is the first in the field, and I am willing to spend a pile of hard cash to succeed. So don't economize on your cable expenses."

"Very well; have you a book on Canadian mines?"

"I don't know that we have, but there is a book here the 'Mining Resources of Canada;' will that be of any use?"

"I shall need something of that sort. I want to be a little familiar with the subject, you know."

"Quite so," said the editor, "I will see what can be got in that line. You can read it before you start and on the way over."

"All right," said Miss Jennie; "and am I to take the pick of the two young men?"

"Certainly," answered the editor. "You will see them both, and can easily make up your mind which will the sooner fall a victim."

"The Colorie sails in a week, does it?"

"Yes."

"Then I shall need at least $500 to get new dresses with."

"Good gracious!" cried the editor.

"There is no 'good gracious' about it. I'm going to travel as a millionaire's daughter, and it isn't likely that one or two dresses will do me all the way over."

"But you can't get new dresses made in a week," said the editor.

"Can't I? Well, you just get me the $500 and I'll see about the making."

The editor jotted the amount down. "You don't think $500 would do?" he said.

"No, I don't. And say, am I to get a trip to Paris after this is over, or must I come directly back?"

"Oh, I guess we can throw in the trip to Paris," said the editor.

"What did you say the names of the young men are? Or are they young? Probably they are old fogies, if they are in the mining business."

"No; they are young, they are shrewd, and they are English. So, you see, your work is cut out for you. Their names are George Wentworth and John Kenyon."

"Oh, Wentworth is my man," said the young woman, breezily. "John Kenyon! I know just what sort of a person he is—somber and taciturn. Sounds too much like John Bunyan, or John Milton, or names of that sort."

"Well, I would if I were you. Go sure about it until you see them. Better not make up your mind about the matter."

"When shall I call for the $500?"

"Oh, that you needn't trouble about. The better way is to get your dresses made, and get the people to send the bills to our office."

"Very well," said the young woman. "I shall be ready. Don't be frightened at the bills when they come in. If they come up to $1,000 remember I told you I would let you know first."

The editor looked at her a moment, and seemed to reflect that perhaps it was better not to give a young lady unlimited credit in New York. So he said: "Wait a bit. I'll write you out an order, and you can take it downstairs."

Miss Jennie took the paper when it was offered to her, and disappeared. When she presented the order in the business office the cashier raised his eyebrows as he noticed the amount, and with a low whistle, said to himself: "Five hundred dollars! I wonder what game Jennie Brewster's up to now."

CHAPTER II.

The last bell had rung. Those who were going ashore had taken their departure. Crowds of human beings clustered on the pier head and at the large doorways of the warehouse which stood open on the steamer wharf. As the big ship slowly backed out there was a fluttering of handkerchiefs from the mass on the pier, and an answering flutter from those who crowded along the bulwarks of the steamer. The tug slowly pulled the prow of the vessel around, and at last the engines of the steamship began their pulsating throbs—throbs that would vibrate night and day until the steamer reached an older world. The crowd on the pier became more and more indistinct to those on board, and many of the passengers went below, for the air was bitterly cold, and the boat was forcing its way down the bay among huge blocks of ice.

Two, at least, of the passengers had taken little interest in the departure. They were leaving no friends behind them, and were both setting their faces toward the lands at home.

"Let us go down," said Wentworth to Kenyon, "and see that we get seats together at table before all are taken."

"Very good," replied his companion, and the descended to the young saloon, where two long tables were already laid with an ostentatious display of silver, glassware and cutlery, which made many, who looked on this wilderness of white linen with something like dismay, wish that the sea might be smooth, which, as it was a winter passage, there was every chance it would not be. The purser and two of his assistants sat at one of the shorter tables with a plan before them, marking off the names of passengers who wished to be together, or who wanted some particular place at any of the tables. The smaller side tables were still uncovered, because the number of passengers at that season of the year was comparatively small. As the places were assigned, one of the helpers to the purser wrote the names of the passengers on small cards, and the other put the cards on the tables.

One young woman, in a beautifully fitted traveling gown, evidently of the newest cut and design, stood a little apart from the general group which surrounded the purser and his assistants. She eagerly scanned every list and listened attentively to the names given. Sometimes a shade of disappointment crossed her brow, as if she expected some particular person to be on some particular name which that particular person did not have. At last her eyes sparkled.

"My name is Wentworth," said the young man whose turn it was.

"Ah! any favorite place, Mr. Wentworth?" asked the purser, blandly, as if he had known Wentworth all his life.

"No, we don't care where we sit; but my friend, Mr. Kenyon, and myself would like places together."

"Very good; you had better come to my table," replied the purser. "Nos. 23 and 24—Mr., Kenyon and Mr. Wentworth."

The steward took the cards that were given him, and placed them to correspond with the numbers the purser had named. Then the young woman moved gracefully along, as if she were interested in the names on the table. She looked at Wentworth's name for a moment, and saw the place next to his the name of Mr. Brown. She gave a quick, apprehensive glance around the saloon, and saw the two young men who had arranged for their seats at table now walking leisurely toward the companionway. She took the card with the name of Mr. Brown upon it, and slipped upon the table another on which was written: "Miss Jennie Brewster." Mr. Brown's card she placed on the spot from which she had taken her own.

"I hope Mr. Brown is not particular which place he occupies," said Miss Jennie, to herself; "but at any rate I shall see that I am early for dinner, and I'm sure Mr. Brown, whoever he is, will not be so ungallant as to insist on having this place if he knows his card was here."

Subsequent events proved Miss Jennie's surmise regarding Mr. Brown's indifference perfectly well founded. That young man searched for his card, found it, and sat down on the chair opposite Miss Jennie, who already occupied her chair, and was, in fact, the first one at table. Seeing there would be no unseemly dispute about places, she began to plan in her own mind how she would direct the attention of Mr. Wentworth. While thinking how best to approach her victim, Miss Jennie heard his voice.

"Here you are, Kenyon, here are our places."

"Which is mine?" said the voice of Kenyon.

"It doesn't matter," answered Wentworth, and then a shrill of fear went through the gentle heart of Miss Jennie Brewster. She had not thought of the young man not caring which seat he occupied, and she dreaded the possibility of finding herself next to Kenyon rather than Wentworth. Her first estimate of the characters of the two men seemed to be correct. She always thought of Kenyon as Bunyan, and she felt certain that Wentworth would be the easier man of the two to influence. The next moment her fears were allayed, for Kenyon giving a rapid glance at the handsome young women, deliberately chose the seat farthest from her, and Wentworth, with: "I beg your pardon," slipped in and sat down on the chair beside her.

"Now," thought Jennie, with a sigh of relief, "our positions are fixed for the meals of the voyage." She had made her plans for beginning an acquaintance with the young man, but they were rendered unnecessary by the gallant Mr. Wentworth handing her the bill of fare.

"Oh, thank you," said Miss Jennie, in a low voice, and as she looked at it Wentworth glanced at her a second time and saw how sweet and pretty and innocent she was.

"I'm in luck," said the unfortunate young man to himself.

Then he remarked aloud: "We have not many ladies with us this voyage."

"No," replied Miss Brewster; "I suppose nobody really crosses at this time of the year unless compelled to."

"I can answer for two passengers that such is the case."

"Do you mean yourself as one?"

"Yes, myself and my friend."

"How pleasant it must be," said Miss Brewster, "to travel with a friend. Then one is not lonely. I, unfortunately, am traveling alone."

"I fancy," said the gallant Wentworth, "that if you are lonely while on board ship it will be entirely your own fault."

Miss Brewster laughed a silvery little laugh. "I don't know about that," she said, "I am going to that Mecca of all Americans—Paris. My father is to meet me there, and we are then going on to the Riviera together."

"Ah! that will be very pleasant," said Wentworth. "The Riviera at this season is certainly a place to be desired."

"So I have heard," she replied.

"Have you not been across before?"

"No, this is my first voyage. I suppose you have made many times?"

"Oh, no," answered the Englishman; "this is only my second voyage, my first having been the one that took me to America."

"Ah, then, you are not an American?" returned Miss Brewster, with apparent surprise. She laughed that a man was generally flattered when a mistake of this kind is made. No matter how proud he may be of his country, it shows that there is certainly no provincialism about him that as the Americans say, "gave him away."

"I think," said Wentworth, "as a general thing, I am not mistaken for anything but what I am—an Englishman."

"I have met so few Englishmen," said the guileless Miss Jennie, "that really I should not be expected to know."

"I understand it is a common delusion among Americans that every Englishman drops his 'h's,' and is to be detected in that way."

Jennie laughed again, and George Wentworth thought it one of the prettiest laughs he had ever heard.

Poor Kenyon was rather neglected by his friend during the dinner. He felt a little gloomy while the course was on, and wished he had an evening paper. Meanwhile Wentworth and the handsome girl beside him got on very well together. At the end of the dinner she seemed to have some difficulty in getting up from her chair, and Wentworth showed her how to turn it around, leaving her free to rise. She thanked him prettily.

"I am going on deck," she said, as she turned to go; "I am so anxious to get my first glimpse of the ocean at night from the deck of a steamer."

"I hope you will let me accompany you?" returned young Wentworth. "The decks are rather slippery, and even when the boat is not rolling it isn't quite safe for a lady unused to the motion of a ship to walk alone in the dark."

"Oh, thank you very much!" replied Miss Brewster, with effusion. "It is kind of you, I am sure; and if you promise not to let me rob you of the pleasure of your after-dinner cigar I shall be most happy to have you accompany me. I will meet you at the top of the stairway in five minutes."

"You are getting on," said Kenyon, as the young woman disappeared.

"What's the use of being on board ship," said Wentworth, "if you don't take advantage of the opportunity for making shipboard acquaintances. There is an unconventionality about life on a steamer that is not without its charm, as, perhaps, you will find out before the voyage is over, John."

"You are wasting your time to ease your conscience because of your heartless desertion of me."

George Wentworth had waited at the top of the companionway a little more than five minutes when Miss Brewster appeared, wrapped in an arrangement tipped with fur, which lent an additional charm to her complexion, set off as it was by a jaunty steamer cap. They stepped out on the deck, and found it not at all as dark as they expected. Little globes of electric light were placed at regular intervals in the walls of the deck building. Overhead was stretched a sort of canvas roof, against which the sleety rain pattered. One of the sailors, with a rubber mop, was pushing into the gutter by the side of the ship the moisture from the deck. All around the boat the night was as black as ink, except here and there where the white curl of a wave showed ominous for a moment in the darkness.

"Poor Mr. Wentworth—only the first night out and he had to say good-bye to Jennie."

Miss Brewster insisted that Wentworth should light his cigar, which, after some persuasion, he did. Then he tucked her hand snugly under his arm, and she adjusted her step to suit his. They had the promenade all to themselves. The rainy winter night was not as inviting to most of the passengers as the comfortable rooms below. Kenyon, however, and one or two others came up, and sat down in the steamer chairs that were tied to the brass rod which ran along the deckhouse wall. He saw the glow of Wentworth's cigar as the couple turned at the further end of the walk, and as the two passed him he heard a low murmur of conversation, and now and then caught a snatch of silvery laughter. I was not because Wentworth had deserted him that Kenyon felt so uncomfortable and depressed. He couldn't tell just what it was, but there had settled on his mind a strange, uneasy foreboding. After a time he went down into the saloon and tried to read, but could not, and so wandered along the seemingly endless narrow passage to his room, which was Wentworth's as well, and, in nautical phrase, "turned in." It was late when his companion came in.

"Asleep, Kenyon?" he asked.

"No," was the answer.

"By George! John, she is one of the most charming girls I ever met. Wonderfully clever, too; makes a man feel like a fool beside her. She has read nearly everything. Has opinions on all our authors, a great many of whom I've never heard of. I wish, for your sake, John, that she had a sister on board."

"Thanks, old man; awfully good of you, I'm sure," said Kenyon. "Don't you think it's about time to stop raving and get into your bunk, and turn out that confounded light?"

"All right, growler, I will," was the answer.

Meanwhile, in her own stateroom, Miss Jennie Brewster was looking at her reflection in the glass. As she took out her long hair until it rippled down her back, she smiled sweetly, and said to herself:

"Poor Mr. Wentworth! Only the first night out and he told me his name was George."

CHAPTER III.

Next morning Wentworth worked his way, with much balancing and holding on of stanchions, along the deck, for the ship rolled fearfully, although there seemed to be little wind and the sun was shining brightly, but the person he sought was nowhere visible. He thought he would go into the smoking-room, but changed his mind at the door, and turned down the companionway to the main saloon. The tables had been cleared of the breakfast things, but on one of the small tables a white cloth had been laid, and as a touch of purity in the general effect of the plush and Miss Brewster, who was piacently ordering what she would have for lunch. From a steward, he did not seem to be pleased in serving one who had disregarded the breakfast hour to the arrangement of all saloon rules. The chief steward stood by a door and locked disapprovingly at the late comer. It was almost time to attend to the table lunch, and the young woman was calmly ordering her breakfast as if she had been the first person at the table.

She looked up brightly at Wentworth and smiled as he approached her.

"I suppose," she began, "you are fearfully late, and the steward looks as if he would like to scold me. How delightfully the ship is rolling. Is there a storm?"

"No. She seems to be doing this sort of thing for amusement. Seems to make it interesting for the unfortunate passengers who are not good sailors, I suppose. She is doing it, too. There is scarcely anyone on deck."

"Dear me, I thought we were in a dreadful storm. Is it raining?"

"No. It's a beautiful sunshiny day, without much wind, either, in spite of all this row."

"I suppose you have had your breakfast long ago?"

"So long since that I am beginning to look forward with pleasant anticipation to lunch."

"Oh dear! I had no idea I was so late as that. Perhaps you had better wait for me. Somebody ought to do it, and the steward seems a little afraid."

"You overestimate my courage. I am a little afraid, too."

"Then you do think I deserve it?"

"I didn't say that, nor do I think I; I confess, however, that for the moment I felt just a trifle lonely."

"Just a trifle! Well, that is flattering. How nicely you English do turn a compliment. Just a trifle!"

"I believe, as a rule, we do not venture much into compliment-giving at all. We leave that for the native foreigner. He would say what I tried to say a great deal better than I did, of course; but he would not mean half so much."

"Oh, that's very nice, Mr. Wentworth. No foreigner could have put it more so well. Now what about going on deck?"

"Anywhere, if you let me be near you."

"I shall be most delighted to have you. I won't say merely a trifle delighted."

"Ah! Haven't you forgiven that remark yet?"

"There's nothing to forgive, and it is quite too delicious to forget. I shall never forget it."

"I believe that you are very cruel at heart, Miss Brewster."

The young woman gave him a curious side look, but did not answer. She gathered the wraps she had taken from the cabin, and, handing them to him before he had thought of offering to take them, they went on deck. It found there other ladies quite equal, indeed the intelligence of the deck steward, who seemed to understand what chairs to place together. Miss Jennie sank gracefully into her own, and allowed him to adjust the wraps around her.

"There," she said, "that's very nicely done; as well as the deck steward himself could do it, and I am sure it is impossible to pay you a more generous compliment than that. So you know how to arrange one comfortably in a steamer chair."

"You speak as though you had had experience in steamer life; and yet you told me this was your first voyage."

"It is. But it doesn't require a full more than a day to see that the average man attends to such little niceties very clumsily. Now, just tuck in the corner out of sight. There! Thank you, that's so much. And would you be kind enough to—yes, that's better. Now that other wrap—oh! Oh! that is perfect. What a patient man you are, Mr. Wentworth."

"Yes, Miss Brewster, you are a foreigner. I can see that now. Your gentle feelings apparently have hollowed. You said I did it perfectly, and then immediately directed me how to do it."

"Nothing of the kind. You did it well, and I think you ought not to grudge me the pleasure of adding my own little improvements."

"Oh, if you put it that way, I will not. Now, before I sat down, [illegible] book I can get that will interest you. The library contains a very good assortment."

"I don't think I care about reading, fit down and talk. I suppose I am too indolent to-day. I thought, when I came on board, that I would do a lot of reading, but I believe the sea air makes one languid. I never was much addicted to mental improvement."

"You evidently do not think my conversation will be at all worth listening to."

"How quick you are to pervert my meaning. Don't you see that I think your conversation better worth listening to than the most interesting or improving book you can choose from the library? Really, in trying to avoid giving you cause for making such a remark, I have apparently stumbled into a worse error. I was just going to say I would like your conversation much better than a book, when I thought you would take that as a reflection on your reading. If you take me up so sharply, I will sit here and say nothing. Now, then, talk."

"What shall I say?"

"Oh, if I told you what to say I should be doing the talking. Tell me about yourself. What do you do in London?"

"I work hard. I am an accountant."

"And what is an accountant? What does he do? Keep accounts?"

"Some of them do; I do not. I am, rather, that accounts other people keep have been correctly kept."

"Aren't they always correctly kept, I thought that was what bookkeepers were hired for."

"If books were always correctly kept there would be little for us to do; but it happens, unfortunately for some but necessarily for us, that people occa sionally do not keep their accounts so correctly."

"And can you always find that out if you examine the books?"

"Always."

"Can't a man make his accounts so that no one can tell that there is anything wrong?"

"The belief that such a thing can be done has placed many a poor wretch in prison. It has been tried often enough."

"I am sure they can do it in the states. I have read of it being done and confessed for years. Men have made off with great sums of money by falsifying the books, and no one found it out till the one who did it died or ran away."

"Nevertheless, if an expert accountant had been called in he would have found out very soon that something was wrong, and just where the wrong was located."

"Why, it's like being a detective. I wish you would tell me about some of the cases you have had. Don't make me ask too many questions. Talk."

"I don't think my experiences would interest you in the least. There was one case with which I had something to do in London two years ago that—"

"In London. I don't believe the bookkeepers there are half so sharp as ours. If you had to deal with American accountants you would not find out so easily what they had or had not done."

"Well, Miss Brewster, what I tell you is, of course, in confidence. I wouldn't like it to get any body else, but I may say I have just had an experience of that kind with some of your very sharpest American bookkeepers. I found that the books had been kept in the most ingenious way, with the intent to deceive. The system had been going on for years."

"How interesting. And did you call in a policeman?"

"No. This was one of the cases where a policeman is not necessary. The books were kept with the object of showing that the profits of the m—of the business—had been much greater than they really were. I may say that one of your American accountants had already looked over the books, and, whether through ignorance or carelessness, or from a worse motive, he reported them all right. They were not all right, and the fact that they were not will make the loss of a fortune to some one on your side of the water and the saving of good money to others on my side."

"Then I think your profession must be a very important one."

"We think so, Miss Brewster. I would like to be paid a percentage on the money saved because of my report."

"And won't you?"

"Unfortunately no."

"I think that is too bad. I suppose the discrepancy must have been small, or the American accountant would not have overlooked it."

"I didn't say that he had overlooked it. Still, the size of the discrepancy does not make the difference. A small error is the kind to look for in a large one. This one was large. I suppose there is no harm in my saying that the books, taking them together, showed a profit of £40,000, when they should have shown a loss of nearly half that amount. I hope nobody overhears me."

"No, we are quite alone, and you may be sure I will not breathe a word of what you have been telling me."

"Don't breathe it to Kenyon, at least. He would think me insane if he knew what I have said."

"Is Mr. Kenyon an accountant, too?"

"Oh, no. He is a mineralogist. He can go into a mine and tell with a reasonable certainty whether it will pay the working of it or not. Of course, as he says himself, any man can see six feet into the earth as well as he can. But it is not every man that can gauge the value of a working mine so well as John Kenyon."

"Then while you were delving among the figures, your companion was delving among the minerals?"

"Precisely."

"And did he make any such startling discovery as you did?"

"No, rather the other way. He finds the mines very good properties, and he thinks that if they are managed intelligently they will be good paying investments—that is, at a proper price, you know—not at what the owners ask for them at present. But you can have no possible interest in these dry details."

"Indeed, you are mistaken. I think what you have told me intensely interesting."

For once in her life Miss Jennie Brewster said the exact truth. The unfortunate man at her side was flattered.

"For what I have told you," he said, "we were offered twice what the London people pay us for coming out here. In fact, even more than that. We were asked to name our own price."

"Really now. By the owners of the property, I suppose, if you wouldn't tell me them?"

"No. By one of your famous New York newspaper men. He even went so far as to steal the papers that Kenyon had in his trunk. He was cleverly caught, though, before he could make any use of what he had stolen. In fact, unless his readers in New York had the figures which were originally placed before the London board I doubt if my statistics would have been of much use to him, even if he had been allowed to keep them. The full significance of my report will not be clear until the figures I have given are compared with those already in the hands of the London people, which were vouched for as correct by your clever American accountant."

"You shouldn't run down an accountant just because he is an American. Perhaps there will come a day, Mr. Wentworth, when you will admit that there are Americans who are more clever than either that accountant or that newspaper man. I don't think your specimens are typical."

"I don't 'run down,' as you call it, the men because they are Americans. I 'run down' the accountant because he was either ignorant or corrupt. I 'run down' the newspaper man because he was a thief."

Miss Brewster was silent for a few moments. She was impressing on her memory what he had said to her and was anxious to get away, so that she could write out in her cabin exactly what had been told her. The sound of the lunch gong gave her the excuse she needed, so, bidding her victim a pleasant and friendly farewell, she hurried from the deck to her stateroom.

CHAPTER IV.

There was one man on board the Colorie to whom Wentworth had taken an extreme dislike. His name was Fleming, and he claimed to be a New York politician. As none of his friends or enemies suspected anything worse about him, it may be assumed that Fleming had designated his occupation correctly. If Wentworth were asked what he most disliked about the man he would probably have said his offensive familiarity. Fleming seemed to think himself a genial good fellow, and he was immensely popular with a certain class in the smoking-room. He was lavishly free with his invitations to drink, and he always had a case of good cigars in his pocket, which he bestowed with great liberality. He had the habit of slapping a man boisterously on the back and saying: "Well, old fellow, how are you? How's things?" He usually confided to his listeners that he was a self made man, had landed at New York without a cent in his pocket, and look at him now.

Wentworth was icy toward this man, but frigidity had no effect whatever on the exuberant spirits of the New York politician.

"Well, old man," cried Fleming to Wentworth, as he came up to the latter and linked arms affectionately. "What lovely weather we are having for winter time."

"It is good," said Wentworth.

"Good. It's glorious! Who would have thought, when leaving New York in a snowstorm as we did, that we would run right into the heart of spring? I hope you are enjoying your voyage?"

"I am."

"You ought to. By the way, why are you so awful stand-offish? Is it natural, or merely put on for this occasion only."

"I do not know what you mean by 'stand-offish.'"

"You know very well what I mean. Why do you pretend to be so stiff and formal with a fellow?"

"I am never stiff and formal with anyone unless I do not desire his acquaintance."

Fleming laughed loudly. "I suppose that's a personal hint. Well, it seems to me, if this voyage is to be a success, that you would be more afraid of newspaper notoriety than of anything else."

"Why do you say that?"

"Because I can't, for the life of me, see why you spend so much time with 'Dolly Dimple.' I am sure I don't know why she is here, but I do know this, that you will be served up to the extent of two or three columns in the Sunday Argus as sure as you live."

"I don't understand you."

"You don't? Why, it's plain enough. You spend all your time with her."

"I do not even know of whom you are speaking."

"Oh, come, now, that's too rich. Is it possible that you don't know that Miss Jennie Brewster is the one who writes those Sunday articles over the signature of 'Dolly Dimple?'"

A strange fear came over Wentworth as his companion mentioned the Argus. He remembered it as J. K. Rivers' paper, but when Fleming said Miss Brewster was a correspondent of the Argus he was aghast.

"I—I—I don't think I quite catch your meaning," he stammered.

"Well, my meaning's easy enough to see. Hasn't she ever told you? That it shows she wants to do you up on toast. You're not an English politician, are you? You haven't any political secrets that Dolly wants to get at, have you? Why, she is the greatest girl there is in the whole state for finding out just what a man doesn't want to have known. You know the secretary of state"—and here Fleming went on to relate a wonderfully brilliant feat of "Dolly," but Mr. Wentworth heard. He was talking had neither eyes nor ears. He heard nothing and he saw nothing.

"Dear me," said Fleming, drawing himself up and slapping the other on the back, "you look perfectly dumbfounded. I suppose I oughtn't to have given Dolly away like this; but she has pretended all along that she didn't know me, and so I got even with her. You take my advice, and anything you don't want to see in print don't you tell Miss Brewster that's all. Have a cigar?"

"No, thank you," replied the other mechanically.

"Better come in and have a drink."

"No, thank you."

"Well, so long. I'll see you later."

"It can't be true. It can't be true," Wentworth repeated to himself, with deep consternation, but still with some misgiving, warning him that, after all, it might be true. With his hands clasped behind him he walked up and down, trying to collect himself—trying to remember what he had told and what he had not. As he walked along, heeding nobody, a sweet voice from one of the chairs thrilled him and he paused.

"Why, Mr. Wentworth, what is the matter with you this morning? You look as if you had seen a ghost."

Wentworth glanced at the young woman seated in the chair, who was gazing up brightly at him.

"Well," he said, at last, "I am not sure but I have seen a ghost. May I sit down beside you?"

"May you? Why of course you may. I shall be delighted to have you. Is there anything wrong?"

"I don't know. Yes, I think there is."

"Well, tell it to me; perhaps I can help you. A woman's wit, you know. What is the trouble?"

"May I ask you a few questions, Miss Brewster?"

"Certainly. A thousand of them if you like; and I will answer them all if I can."

"Thank you. Will you tell me, Miss Brewster, if you are connected with any newspaper?"

Miss Brewster laughed her merry, silvery, little laugh. "Who told you? Ah! I see how it is. It was that creature Fleming. I'll get even with him for this some day. I know what office he is after, and the next time he wants a good notice from the Argus he'll get it; see if he don't. I know some things about him that he would just as soon not see in print. Why, what a fool the man is! I suppose he told you out of revenge, because I wouldn't speak to him the other evening. Never mind, I can afford to wait."

"Then—then, Miss Brewster, it is true."

"Certainly it is true; is there anything wrong about it? I hope you don't think it is disreputable to belong to a good newspaper?"

"To a good newspaper, no; to a bad newspaper, yes."

"Oh, I don't think the Argus is a bad newspaper. It pays well."

"Then it is to the Argus that you belong?"

"Certainly."

"May I ask, Miss Brewster, if there is anything I have spoken to you about that you intend to use in your paper?"

Again Miss Brewster laughed. "I will be perfectly frank with you. I never tell a lie—it doesn't pay. Yes,

"You haven't any political secrets that Dolly wants to get at, have you?"

the reason I am here is because you are here. I am sent to find out what your report on those mines will be, also what the report of your friend will be. I have found out."

"And do you intend to use the information you have thus obtained—if I may say it—under false pretenses?"

"My dear sir, you are forgetting yourself. You must remember that you are talking to a lady."

"A lady!" cried Wentworth in his anguish.

"Yes, sir, a lady; and you must be careful how you talk to this lady. There was no false pretense about it, if you remember. What you told me was in conversation; I didn't ask you for it. I didn't even make the first advances toward your acquaintance."

"But you must admit, Miss Brewster, that it is very unfair to get a man to engage in what he thinks is a private conversation, and then to publish what he has said."

"My dear sir, if that were the case, how would we get anything for publication that people didn't want to be known? Why, I remember once, when the secretary of state—"

"Yes," interrupted Wentworth, wearily, "Fleming told me the story."

"Oh, did he? Well, I'm sure I'm much obliged to him. Then I need not repeat it."

"Do you mean to say that you intend to send to the Argus for publication what I have told you in confidence?"

"Certainly. As I said before, that is what I am here for. Besides, there is no 'in confidence' about it."

"And yet you pretend to be a truthful, honest, honorable woman?"

"I don't pretend it, I am."

"How much truth, then, is there in your story that you are a millionaire's daughter about to visit your father in Paris, and accompany him from there to the Riviera?"

Miss Brewster laughed brightly, but I don't call that in a person has to tell in the way of business untruths."

"Then probably you would not call what Mr. J. K. Rivers, of your estimable paper, did in Ottawa dishonorable?"

"Well, hardly. I think Rivers was not justified, but I would be glad if he was unsuccessful, that is all. I'll bet a dollar if I had got hold of those papers they would have gone through to New York; but then J. K. Rivers is only a stupid man, and most men are stupid," with a sly glance at Wentworth.

"I am willing to admit that, Miss Brewster, if you mean me. There never was a more stupid man than I have been."

"My dear Mr. Wentworth, it will do you ever so much good if you come to a realization of that fact. The truth is, you take yourself much too seriously. Now, it won't hurt you a bit to have what I am going to have published in the Argus, and it will help me a great deal. Just you wait here for a few moments." With that she flung her book upon his lap, sprang up, and vanished down the companionway. In a very short time she reappeared with some sheets of paper in her hand.

"Now, you see how fair and honest I am going to be. I am going to read you what I have written. If there is anything in it that is not true, I will very gladly cut it out; and if there is anything more to be added, I shall be very glad to add it. Isn't that fair?"

Wentworth was so confounded with the woman's impudence that he could make no reply.

She began to read: "By an unexplained stroke of enterprise, the New York Argus is enabled this morning to lay before its readers a full and exclusive account of the report made by the two English specialists, Mr. George Wentworth and Mr. John Kenyon, who were sent over by the London syndicate to examine into the accounts and inquire into the true value of the mines of the Ottawa river." She looked up from the paper and said, with an air of friendly confidence:

"I shouldn't send that if I thought the people at the New York end would know enough to write it themselves; but as the paper is edited by dull men, and not by a sharp woman, I have to make them pay 25 cents a word for puffing their own enterprise. Well, to go on:

"When it is remembered that the action of the London syndicate will depend entirely on the report of these two gentlemen—"

"I wouldn't put it that way," interrupted Wentworth, in his despair. "I would use the word 'largely' for 'entirely.'"

"Oh, thank you," said Miss Brewster, cordially. She placed the manuscript on her knee, and with her pencil marked out the word "entirely," substituting "largely." The reading went on: "When it is remembered that the action of the London syndicate will depend largely on the report of these two gentlemen, the enterprise of the Argus in getting this exclusive information, which will be immediately cabled to London, is magnificent. That is the preliminary, you see; and, as I said, it wouldn't be necessary to cable it if women were at the head of affairs over there, which they are not.) Mr. John Kenyon, the mining expert, has visited all the mineral ranges along the Ottawa river, and his report is that the mines are very much what is claimed for them; but he thinks they are not worked properly, although, with judicious management and more capital behind, the properties can be made to pay good dividends. Mr. George Wentworth, who is one of the leading accountants of London—"

"I wouldn't say that, either," groaned George. "Just strike out the words, 'one of the leading accountants of London.'"

"Yes?" said Miss Brewster; "and what shall I put in place of them?"

"Put any one you like, so long as I am not 'one of them, 'the stupidest ass in London.'"

Miss Brewster laughed at that. "No; I shall put in what I first wrote: 'Mr. George Wentworth, one of the leading accountants of London, has gone through the books of the different mines. He has made some startling discoveries. The secrets have been kept in such a way as to completely delude investors, and this fact will have a powerful effect on the minds of the London syndicate. Two names were proposed—Scotton's and yours. I voted for you; not that I knew anything about you, but some of the others seemed very anxious that Scotton should go, so I thought it best to vote for you. There—you see, as I said before, I am partly responsible for your being here."

"I hope you will not be dissatisfied with the result, Mr. Longworth."

"I hope not myself. I can see that you are a cautious man, and those who recommended you vouched for your capabilities, so with caution and capacity a man should succeed. I intended to visit the properties, but I was delayed, and I went to the west that I did not have time to go north. How did you find the mines?"

"Since you complimented me on my caution, Mr. Longworth, I should be sorry to have my personal opinion by answering your questions."

"Quite right; quite right," said the elderly gentleman, laughing again. "That's one for you, and a very good one, too. I must tell that to my daughter; she likes me to be cautious. Edith, my dear, this is Mr. Kenyon, who went out to examine our mines. Curious, isn't it, that we should have been talking about them this very morning? Mr. Kenyon, I call my daughter my confidential man of business; she has been all over the world with me. I never make any investments without consulting her, so I warn you that she will ask you more insidious questions about the mines than I shall."

John Kenyon had risen to his feet to greet the girl and to offer her his chair.

"No, thank you," she said. "I want to walk. I have only come to see if my father was all right. I was very much disappointed that we did not go to Canada this time, as I wished to see something of the snow-shoeing and tobogganing there. I suppose there was no toboggan slide where you were?"

"Oh, yes," said Kenyon; "even out among the mines they had a toboggan slide, on which one trip satisfied me; and on several journeys I had to wear snow-shoes myself."

"How interesting," said the girl. And the next thing John knew he was walking the deck with her, relating his experiences. This walk was the first of many, and from that time forward Kenyon did not miss his friend Wentworth.

"Well, I mean just this: We will probably reach Queenstown on Saturday afternoon. This report, making allowance for the difference in the time, will appear in the Argus on Sunday morning. Your telegram will reach your house or your firm on Saturday night, when nothing can be done while it is. Sunday nothing can be done. Monday morning, before your report will reach the directors, the substance of what has appeared in the Argus will be in the financial papers in London, and will be on Sunday night. The first thing your directors will see of it will be in the London financial papers on Monday morning. That's what I mean, Mr. Wentworth, by calculating the voyage."

Wentworth said no more. He staggered to his feet and made his way as best he could to the stateroom, groping like a blind man. There he sat down with his head in his hands, and there his friend Kenyon found him.

CHAPTER V.

John Kenyon, deserted by his only friend on board, made no complaint, nor did he endeavor to make up for his loss by finding new acquaintances. He was not a man to form friendships readily, but fate was kind to him, and had already set about adjusting the balance of profit and loss; moreover fate, who likes to do things in a fitting manner, used the deserter as an instrument.

Wentworth's conscience seemed to be troubling him because he left his old friend so much alone going east, whereas they had been constantly together on the trip westward; therefore he considered it his duty to make an apology to Kenyon every morning, before placing himself for the rest of the day under the fascinating influence of Miss Brewster.

"There is nothing you wish to talk with me about, is there, Kenyon?" asked Wentworth on one of these occasions, looking down at his friend seated in his deck chair.

"Nothing in particular."

"Then you don't mind—"

"Not in the least," interrupted Ker yon, with a smile.

"I want you to do some energetic thinking before our return, you know, so that you will be ready to open the campaign when we reach London. Thinking which is worth anything is best done in solitude, Kenyon, so I will not disturb you—I'll see you later."

Again Kenyon smiled, but made no reply, and Wentworth departed.

The elderly gentleman whose chair was next to Kenyon's, looked round as the young man when his friend mentioned the mine and his name.

"Are you Mr. Kenyon, the mining expert?" he asked, when Wentworth walked away.

"I am a mining engineer," answered Kenyon, with some surprise.

"Did you go out to Canada to report on mines there for the London syndicate?"

"Why do you ask?" said Kenyon, all his native caution being aroused in a moment, on hearing the astonishing question.

"Because I am, in a measure, responsible for you," he said. "I am Mr. Longworth—John Longworth, of the city—and a member of the London syndicate. Two names were proposed—Scotton's and yours. I voted for you; not that I knew anything about you, but some of the others seemed very anxious that Scotton should go, so I thought it best to vote for you. There fore, you see, as I said before, I am partly responsible for your being here."

"I hope you will not be dissatisfied with the result, Mr. Longworth."

"I hope not myself. I can see that you are a cautious man, and those who recommended you vouched for your capabilities, so with caution and capacity a man should succeed. I intended to visit the properties, but I was delayed, and I went to the west that I did not have time to go north. How did you find the mines?"

"Since you complimented me on my caution, Mr. Longworth, I should be sorry to have my personal opinion by answering your questions."

"Quite right; quite right," said the elderly gentleman, laughing again. "That's one for you, and a very good one, too. I must tell that to my daughter; she likes me to be cautious. Edith, my dear, this is Mr. Kenyon, who went out to examine our mines. Curious, isn't it, that we should have been talking about them this very morning? Mr. Kenyon, I call my daughter my confidential man of business; she has been all over the world with me. I never make any investments without consulting her, so I warn you that she will ask you more insidious questions about the mines than I shall."

John Kenyon had risen to his feet to greet the girl and to offer her his chair.

"No, thank you," she said. "I want to walk. I have only come to see if my father was all right. I was very much disappointed that we did not go to Canada this time, as I wished to see something of the snow-shoeing and tobogganing there. I suppose there was no toboggan slide where you were?"

"Oh, yes," said Kenyon; "even out among the mines they had a toboggan slide, on which one trip satisfied me; and on several journeys I had to wear snow-shoes myself."

"How interesting," said the girl. And the next thing John knew he was walking the deck with her, relating his experiences. This walk was the first of many, and from that time forward Kenyon did not miss his friend Wentworth.

Edith Longworth can hardly be called a typical representative of the English girl. She had an English girl's education, but she had not the training of the average English girl. She had lost her mother early in life, which makes a great difference in a girl's training, however wealthy her father may be; and Edith's father was wealthy, there was no doubt of that

...ny man about the standing of ...n Longworth, and you will learn ...t the "house" is well thought of. People said he was lucky, but John Longworth asserted that there was no such thing as luck in business—in which statement he was very likely not correct. He had large investments in almost every quarter of the globe. When he went into a thing he went into it thoroughly. People talk of the inadvisability of putting all one's eggs into one basket, but John Longworth was a believer in doing just every thing—and in watching the basket. Not that he had all his eggs in one basket, or in even one kind of a basket, but when John Longworth was satisfied with the particular variety of basket presented to him he put a large number of eggs in it. When anything was offered for investment—whether it was a mine, a brewery or a railway—John Longworth took an expert's opinion upon it, and then the chances were that he would disregard the advice given. He was in the habit of going personally to see what had been offered to him. If the enterprise were big enough he thought little of taking a voyage to the other side of the world for the sole purpose of looking the investment over.

When Edith Longworth was pronounced finished, as far as education was concerned, she became more and more the companion of her father. She went with him on his long journeys, and so had been several times to America, once to the cape, and one long voyage, with Australia as the objective point, had taken her completely around the world. She inherited much of [illegible] restless, and there is no doubt that if Miss Longworth had been cast upon her own resources she would have become an excellent business woman. She knew exactly the extent of her father's investments, and she was his confidante in a way that few women are with their male relatives. The old man had great faith in his daughter's opinion, although he rarely acknowledged it. Having been together so much on such long voyages, they naturally became, in a way, boon companions. Thus Edith's education was very unlike that of the ordinary English girl's training, which caused her to develop into a different kind of a woman than she would have been if her mother had lived.

The friendship between Edith Longworth and John Kenyon ripened so rapidly that on the day Wentworth had his last disquieting interview with Jennie Brewster they also were discussing mining properties, but in some what different fashion. Kenyon confided to the girl the hopes and fears were wrapped up in a mine.

After completing their work for the London syndicate, the young men had transacted a little business on their own account. They visited together the Helen mine, which was losing paying expenses, and which the owners were anxious to sell. The mine was owned by the Austrian Mining company whose agent, Von Brent, had met Kenyon in Ottawa. Kenyon's educated eye had told him that the white mineral they were placing on the dump at the mouth of the mine was more valuable than the mica for which they were mining. Kenyon was scrupulously honest—a quality somewhat at discount in the mining business—and it seemed to him hardly fair that he should take advantage of the ignorance of Von Brent regarding the mineral on the dump. Wentworth had some shares in the mine, which his friend's services. He insisted that knowledge always had to be paid for, in law, medicine, or mineralogy, and therefore that they were perfectly justified in profiting by their superior wisdom. So it came about that the young men took to England with them a three months' option on the mine, which means that for three months they were to have the privilege of buying the property at a certain figure named in the legal document which is used in the mining language, the "option."

"Well, I am sure," said Miss Longworth, when Kenyon had given her all the details, "if you are confident that the mine is a good one you could see no one who would help you more in that way than my father. He has been looking at a brewery business in which he thought of investing, and with which he has consented to have nothing to do, so he will be anxious for something reliable to take its place. How much would be required for the purchase of the mine you mention?"

"I thought of asking £50,000 for it," said Kenyon, flushing as he thought of his temerity in doubling the price of the mine, and adding £10,000 to it. However, Wentworth and he had estimated the probable value of the mine, and had concluded that selling it at that price, which would give them £30,000 to divide between them, they were selling a mine which was really worth very much more, and that would soon pay tremendous dividends on the £50,000. Even at that price they would seem rather impressed by the amount. He was therefore very much surprised when she said:

"Fifty thousand pounds! Is that all? Then I am afraid my father would have nothing to say to it. He deals only with large businesses, and a company with a capital of but £50,000 I am sure he would not look at."

"You speak of £50,000," said Kenyon, "as though it were a trifle. To me it seems an immense fortune."

"You are not wealthy, then?" said the girl, with apparent interest.

"No," replied the young man; "far from it."

"I will speak to my father, if you like, but I doubt if it would do much good. Perhaps William might take it up. You have not met my cousin yet, I think?"

"No. Is he the young man who sits next to you at the table?"

"Yes. Except when there, he spends most of his time in the smoking-room, I believe. He is in father's office in the city, and we are both very anxious that he shall succeed in business. That is why father took him with us to

INTERESTING NOTES CONCERNING THE FOOTBALL PLAYERS.

Comment on Local Players and What Their Chances Are With the Teams That They Are Matched to Play Against.

No game was arranged between the Hunters and the Alis teams for last Friday afternoon. The Hunter team practiced that afternoon on Park avenue grounds, also that evening. The Hunter team averages from 18 to 20 years and from 140 to 150 pounds and will play all teams averaging about the same.

Negotiations have almost been concluded between the Y. M. C. A. football team and the eleven from the New Jersey Athletic Club for a game on Saturday. The Jersey boys are very anxious to play the Plainfield team and are now offering to come at more reasonable terms. Should the game be played, it will be the hardest of the season for the Plainfield players.

VARIOUS SPORTS.

With the approach of winter comes hockey, the best of all winter sports and the Plainfield High School Athletic Association is planning for a team this season. Carroll Runyon is manager of the team and is already considering the make up of the team. A challenge has been received from the Montclair High School which will probably be accepted as once. Other games will be arranged with New York schools and games played in the ice rink there. They are hoping that the Crescent Cycle Academy will be converted into one so that games can be played there. Manager Runyon expects to organize two teams as there is an abundance of good material in the High School. Among the principal candidates for the first team are Carrol Runyon, Walter Serrell, Harold Chandor, Sydney R. Titsworth, Charles Noble, William Fisher, Lindley Hillman, George Proctor Smith, Walter Squires, and Herman Osmond.

CYCLING COMMENT.

A new bicycle club has been organized in this city. No name has yet been selected but will be at a meeting in the near future. The organizers anticipate a lively season for the club next year when regular runs will be held. Although the club has only been started a few days the member bership is already over twenty. Among the originators of this new club are Herbert Overbaugh, George Babcock, Bert Eick, Bert Sutphen and Walter Frey. The club-rooms will be those over Woolston & Buckle's store on North avenue, formerly occupied by the Crescent Wheelmen.

A Chimney Fire.

An alarm of fire, sent in from box 15, corner of Washington and East Third streets, by Patrolman Myers, called out the fire department at 12:40 this morning. The fire proved to be in the chimney on the house owned by Wm. Brown, 262 East Third street, and it was found necessary to use five extinguishers to put the fire out. The smell of smoke awakened the family and they notified the patrolman who sent in the alarm. The damage was slight.

SILVER WEDDING EVENT

MR. AND MRS. WILLIAM E. GARDNER SURPRISED LAST EVENING.

A Party of Friends Make an Unexpected Visitation and the Evening Was Passed Away in a Most Pleasant Manner.

The silver wedding anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. William E. Gardner, of 908 Central avenue, was celebrated last evening by a complete surprise. Their daughters, the Misses Gardner, arranged the affair, which was a delightful one. The decorations, green and white, were exceedingly pretty and consisted of white chrysanthemums, smilax vines, potted plants and ferns, which were arranged in an alcove and formed a massive bank of nature's choicest flowers.

A handsome present given to Mr. and Mrs. Gardner was a basket containing twenty-five white chrysanthemums, tied with a satin bow bearing the dates 1871-1896. Genuine sociability was the feature of the evening, and the bride and groom were showered with congratulations. They also received a fine collection of presents.

Those present were: Mr. and Mrs. John Turner, Miss Phoebe Turner, Mrs. LaBar, Forbes Deguid, New York; Mr. and Mrs. G. C. Haynes, Geo. Haynes, Mr. and Mrs. E. Burnett, Union, Union county; Mr. and Mrs. S. H. Atteridge, Mr. and Mrs. W. Atteridge, Chatham; Mrs. John Earl, John Earl, E. Miller, John Miller, Elizabeth; Mr. and Mrs. John Darling; Miss Mable Darling, Mrs. Mary Wade, Miss Mary Gardner, the Misses Gardner, Miss F. Fuller and J. Fuller.

Ed White's Wheel Stolen.

Edward White, of Myrtle avenue, loaned his wheel to a friend on Sunday to take a ride. The friend stopped in Scotch Plains a moment and left the wheel and when he returned the wheel was gone and no trace of it has yet been found. It is supposed that someone rode it away. It was a brand-new Columbia.

WHO ARE THE UNEMPLOYED?

Aid Association Say it is Not Always Best to Give Indiscriminately.

As winter approaches the problem of caring for the unemployed is again made prominent among the churches and charitable societies of Plainfield. It is well to bear in mind the fact that The Organized Aid Association makes a business of this subject. It employs the services of a trained agent and has all the machinery necessary to investigate and determine whether or not a person who seeks aid on the ground of poverty and lack of work is really worthy. It is but little less than a crime to give aid to a man or woman poor and out of work because of lazy or intemperate habits or by reason of extravagance. It does not follow that a person out of work with no money in his pocket is worthy of charity. An all important question is, what is this persons past record, and today is he poor and idle. The Organized Aid Association can will cheerfully answer these questions for individuals, churches and societies. The office of the Association in the Relief building, West Front street and is open at all times.

Sociable Postponed.

The sociable of the Ladies' Christian Work Society of Trinity Reformed church, which was to be held on Friday night, has been indefinitely postponed on account of the illness of the pastor, Rev. Cornelius Schenck, Ph. D.

Death of Peter Tims.

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN.

Lowell Admired the Genius in It More Than the Moral.

It was the opinion of James Russell Lowell, says Charles Dudley Warner, in the Atlantic, that the anti-slavery element in Uncle Tom and Dred stood in the way of a full appreciation, at least in her own country, of the remarkable genius of Mrs. Stowe. Writing in 1859, he said: "From my habits and the tendency of my studies I cannot help looking at things purely from an aesthetic point of view, and what I valued in Uncle Tom was the genius, and not the moral." This had been his impression when he read the book in Paris, long after the whirl of excitement produced by its publication had subsided, and far removed by distance from local influences. Subsequently, in a review, he wrote: "We felt then, and we believe now, that the secret of Mrs. Stowe's power lay in that same genius by which the great successes in creative literature have always been achieved—the genius that instinctively goes to the organic elements of human nature, whether under a white skin or a black, and which disregards as trivial the conventions and fictitious notions which make so large a part both of our thinking and feeling. * * * The creative faculty of Mrs. Stowe, like that of Cervantes in 'Don Quixote,' and of Fielding in 'Joseph Andrews,' overpowered the narrow specialty of her design, and expanded a local and temporary theme with the cosmopolitanism of genius."

MR. MARTINE TO HIS FRIENDS.

We have again fought the fight and are outvoted—though we have accomplished in this stronghold of opposition all we had reason to expect—we have reduced the majority of our opponents some 1400. This is a victory. Our platform deserved better success at the hands of our Citizens—though we have sown seed that will bear fruit later on. I esteemed it an honor to lead my party in this contest, and to the many friends in both parties, who so earnestly supported me against such fearful odds, I cannot fully express my feelings of gratitude. A thousand thanks.

JOHN HAND CAMP ELECT

H. E. McVOY WILL BE THE PRESIDING OFFICER.

After the Election the Camp Was Inspected by Inspecting Officer Claddox and Sigh Rating Will be Soon Given.

The meeting of John Hand Camp No. 28, Sons of Veterans, held last Tuesday was one of the best in the history of the Camp. The attendance was large and visitors were present from New Brunswick, Rahway and Somerville. The first business of importance was the annual election of officers which resulted as follows: Captain, H. C. McVoy; First Lieutenant, H. S. Thatcher; Second Lieutenant, Louis Eaton; Camp Council, W. C. Hobbins, W. V. Sutton, Charles Wills; Delegate at large to Division Encampment, Raymond McVoy; Alternate at large, Israel Stites; Delegate, Fred Sutton; Alternate, Louis Eaton; Delegates to Death Benefit Association, Geo. B. Whitely; Frank Clarkson; Alternate, H. J. Martin; H. S. Thatcher.

The election was followed by the muster of a recruit into the degrees of Charity and Loyalty, which was performed in a commendable manner. The camp was then inspected by Inspecting officer Claddox, of Rahway. Of course, the rating of the camp is not known as yet, but the members feel as though they will receive a high mark, by their work was the best ever performed by the camp. In the good of the order there were speeches by Inspecting Officer Claddox, of Rahway; Jesse Dungan, and Walter Vanderhoff, of Somerville, and the newly elected officers. After the meeting the members partook of some refreshments which were provided. The officers-elect will be installed early in January and it is quite likely that the custom of previous years will be followed, and the Sons will join with the G. A. R. and W. R. C., in their installation which will be public.

"IAN MACLAREN" IN AMERICA.

The Author's Lecture Tour Proves a Wonderful Success.

The short series of readings and lectures by the Rev. Dr. John Watson "Ian Maclaren," who appears in Music Hall, December 8, and which will end in a couple of weeks, have proved phenomenally successful. Of all the famous men of thought and action who have lectured under the management of Major J. B. Pond, none ever made as great a financial success as the sprightly Henry M. Stanley, who drew no larger houses, but who lectured at higher prices.

Major Pond offered Dr. Watson $50,000 to continue his tour for an additional twenty five weeks, but he declined the offer in order to return to his ministerial charge. For the purpose of his present tour he got a three months' vacation, which ends on December 17th.

Mr. Hart, of the firm of Hillier & Co., of Newark, was in Plainfield Tuesday looking after the interest of the firm's business in this city.

William Loring and William Cadman, of Brooklyn, who have been visiting friends in the borough, returned home Tuesday.

EDITOR POTTER BEATEN.

Verdicts for Libel and Damages of Property Found Against Him.

Judge E. S. Atwater of Elizabeth Monday afternoon gave two decisions that had been withheld for sometime. They were concerning the suits brought by Hugo C. Fett of Cranford against John A. Potter, the publisher of the weekly paper in town.

The first was a suit for libel. Potter published an article in which he intimated that Fett was the meanest man in the world—so mean that none of the notorious mean men could compare with him. A verdict was asked, according to Fett's counsel, Judge Gilhooly, not so much for the money remuneration, but of sufficient severity to stop Potter from further attacks of similar nature. The case was tried on Nov. 19. Judge Atwater gave Fett a verdict for $50.

In the second case Fett claimed that while fitting his steam pipes and other working appurtenances of his plant in the building, Potter had damaged the structure. Fett sued as owner, and today was given a verdict for $25.

It is rumored that both cases will be appealed by Potter.

THE PLAINS NEEDS PROTECTION.

Seems to be an Unusual Amount of Depredations Going on There.

The blowing open and robbing of of the safe in John Marsh's meat market at Scotch Plains, during Saturday night, was undoubtedly the work of professional thieves for it was by no means a bungling job. While the robbers got not so much as a postal stamp for their trouble, it is evident that the robbery was carefully planned And here again is an illustration of the necessity of a night watchman or two. The cost would be comparatively trifling and besides the residents could go to bed believing that they had at least some protection. Within a few weeks past the Fanwood Club house, a church, the school house and several dwelling houses been entered and robbed and some of the residents express a fear that some of the dwelling houses and the town pump may be removed some night, unless some action is soon taken to prevent it. The town is now ripe for the appointment of a night watchman or two.

Somerset's Valuation.

The State Board of Taxation reports the realty of Somerset county at $15,337,271; the personalty at $5,572 941. The total valuation is $17,758,654 The Somerset realty is assessed at nearly two hundred thousand dollars over 1895, and the personalty at over one hundred thousand dollars under 1895. In Essex, where the trick of hiding personal property is at its highest estate the decrease is nearly four hundred thousand dollars, while realty has increased five millions. The total valuation of taxable property, after deductions, is $797,404,502.—Somerset Democrat.

Clever Entertainment Arranged.

The Ladies' Christian Work Society of Trinity Reformed church will present a fine musical entertainment on Friday evening. Among those who will take part are Mrs. Asa Collier, the soprano soloist, and J. W. Van Eps, who will furnish music with his phonograph. There will be other attractions of equal merit. The price of admission will be 25 cents and the proceeds will go toward defraying the expenses of the church choir.

FISK ELECTED BY A REDUCED MAJORITY.

THE FARMER ORATOR MADE HIM HUSTLE TO GET THERE THOUGH.

Fisk Gets 370 Plurality, While Lounsbury on the Same Ticket Gets 873 Over the Other Candidates—Every Republican Elected.

Charles J. Fisk is elected Mayor by a plurality of 370, and a majority of 334.

He ran 453 votes behind the plurality of Elias H. Bird, for Collector, and 503 votes behind the plurality of Fred C. Lounsbury for School Trustee, the other Republican candidates who had straight opposition in the city at large.

Alexander Titsworth, the Republican candidate for Treasurer, has a majority of 1732, the Socialist-Labor candidate being the only opposition he received.

The Councilmanic candidates of the Republicans all go into office with majorities ranging from 93 to 227.

The rest of the Republican ticket was elected by the usual majorities.

Lounsbury receives the largest majority, 873. One year ago the largest majority of any Republican candidate was that of Judge DeMeza, who received 812. Bird's majority one year ago was 345.

The campaign, it was planned by the Republicans, was to run its natural course without the injections of usual methods, but soon after Mr. Martine had been nominated, the political joke that they thought had been perpetrated was evolving into a sentiment that did not bide them well if they remained quiet, as was first intended. Then it was that they brought every influence to bear against the candidacy of Mr. Martine, and up to the time the polls closed last night the party-workers availed themselves of every point to bring bring votes to their leader.

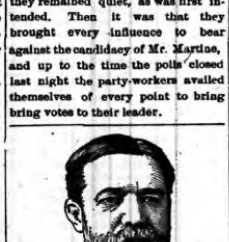
E. H. Bird, Collector-elect.

When James E. Martine was nominated for Mayor by the Democratic city convention it was thought and conceded that he was but a party sacrifice up an altar of an overwhelming Republican majority, the latter made sure by the sixteen hundred and odd rolled up for McKinley a month ago and nurtured by a Republican organization that is manned by a corps of workers who are way up in the art of political warfare. True, the results show that he went down to defeat, but the majority was such a shrinking from that which was expected when Charles J. Fisk was made the standard bearer of the Republicans that the Farmer Orator's aide to the minority was one fraught with incidents and fears that he might turn from the trend of affairs and land in the Mayoralty chair after all by a path of the secret ballot.



Alex. Gilbert, whom Fisk Succeeds.

The principal reason for the opposition to Mr. Fisk among his own party affiliations is the belief that he represented and was in favor of a system of municipal government that is too costly. Of course, it was not one idea alone that jeopardized his election, but all the various ones that a dominant party is bound to engender in a few years of government, and they all found a venting place in the candidacy of a man who was known to hold views different from those of Mr. Fisk.

Added to the grievances of the dissatisfied Republicans was the personal popularity of Mr. Martine, and the Democrats had a formidable candidate in the field. At no time did Mr. Martine really think he would be elected, but he felt a personal pride that the Republican majority should be reduced, and in this direction he was highly gratified.

There were no exciting incidents around the polls during the voting hours. Last night after the count had gone on for a few hours things looked very favorable for Mr Martine, and it was thought that the contest would be very close either one way or the other. Especially about 11 o'clock the counting was favorable for the Democrats, but later on the tide turned and Mr. Fisk's election was assured. All the polling places were crowded during the count and more interest seemed dominant than over the Presidential election.

Mr. Martine spent most of the evening at John Kenney's shoe store with a party of friends where he received the results.

The Third ward polling place, at Pope's stable, was the rendezvous for Mr. Fisk and his friends. Here they received news from the other districts. At first, the news was rather unfavorable to the Republican candidate, and Mr. Fisk appeared like a Second Napoleon surrounded by his staff, taking the news of his defeat in silence. But it wasn't a defeat after all, as the later reports showed, and the "Napolean" and his staff soon realized the fact. Roger Murray, the secretary of the Republican City Executive Committee, was hustling all the evening. With one eye on the tally sheets and the other on the telephone he kept pretty well posted as to how the count was going.

Notes of the Elections.

At the first ward, first district polling place on North avenue, Tuesday, a placard in bold letters tacked to the end of an election booth, read: 'Come and bring your children."

The usual number of Republican heelers floated about the polls in the various wards, Tuesday, and outside of one polling place, one colored man was heard to remark that he made enough off the election to buy him a ton of coal and a turkey for his Christmas dinner.

The atmosphere was a trifle keen for electioneering, Tuesday, but a good amount of it was done in hallways and other out of the way places.

They Settle to Avoid Publicity.

Two of the hunters who invaded the property of Mrs. Bartell Wormser near Union Village and assaulted her, then running away, as was told at the time in the Press, have settled in preference to having the matter brought up in court.

THE DEFEATED TO THE VICTOR!

HON. CHAS. J. FISK.

DEAR SIR:—

Kindly accept congratulations on your success. The city is assured of an honest administration under your guidance.

Very Respectfully

Dec. 2d, 1896. J. E. MARTINE.

J. E. Martine, Defeated.

STATE POLITICAL TALK

IMPORTANT APPOINTMENTS TO BE MADE BY GOVERNOR GRIGGS.

A Good Deal of Speculation as to What the Governor Will Do With the Offices Which Are Now Filled by Democrats.

Seven weeks before the meeting of the Legislature the organization is settled so far as the Presidency of the Senate and Speakership of the House are concerned. Senator Williams, of Passaic, who was elected President in the upper House on the last day of the last session to to fill the vacancy caused by President Thompson's resignation, has no opposition to a re-election. For the Speakership of the Assembly George W. MacPherson, of Mercer, will have a walkover. MacPherson's success was assured, but he has received pledges of support from his chief opponents, and the only competitors remaining are looking solely to good committee appointments.

The interest over the division of the subordinate places is overshadowed by that taken in the appointments Gov. Griggs will have to make during the session. The principal appointments will be a Secretary of State, an Attorney General, a Justice of the Supreme Court, two Judges of the Court of Errors and Appeals, Supreme Court Clerk a Supervisor of the State Prison, two members of the State Board of Assessors and Law Judges in Essex, Camden and Passaic counties. Besides these the Legislature in joint session will elect a State Comptroller and a State Treasurer. It is conceded that Comptroller Hancock and Treasurer Swain will be re-elected, but a good many people are speculating over what Gov. Griggs will do with the offices named, all but two of which are now filled by Democrats.

Since the election there has been some quiet talk about recognizing the sound-money Democrats for the part they took in rolling up the big majority for McKinley and Hobart in New Jersey. It is indulged in chiefly by the office-holders and their close friends. Secretary of State Kelsey is one of the former, and he has announced that he is a candidate for reappointment to the fat office he has held for more than twenty six years. Mr. Kelsey says he was the first Democrat of prominence in New Jersey to declare his opposition to Bryan and the Chicago platform and his intention to vote for McKinley. He says that there were at least 50,000 such Democrats in New Jersey, and they should receive some recognition. Friends of Attorney-General Stockton think he should be reappointed for the same reason, and because he wrote a letter during the campaign that gave the Republicans in New Jersey many votes; besides, they say, he is old, and having devoted his life to the State's interest should not be displaced now in his old age.

GREAT IS UNCLE SAM

OUR COUNTRY THE SUBJECT OF THANKSGIVING REMARKS.

Both Revs. J. W. Richardson and Robert Lowry Refer to the Recent National Election in Their Sermons.

The Union Thanksgiving service held in the First M. E. church Thursday morning was not very well attended, but those who staid away missed an excellent and soul-stirring discourse. Rev. W. C. O'Donnell, opened the service with a fervent and earnest prayer, and Rev. Dr. D. J. Yerkes read the Scripture lesson.

Dr. Barnes, in introducing Dr. Robert Lowry, spoke concerning the absence of Rev. Cornelius Schenck, and he said that he hoped that all would remember Mr. Schenck in their prayers, that he might speedily recover his health.

Dr. Lowry took his text from the first verse of 137th Psalm: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning." In part the doctor said:

"These words were used in the days of Babylonian bondage, when the Jews had become idiotic in their conduct. They had neglected their government and turned their minds to temporal affairs. As politicians they had had their day and the essential forces which make men what they should be was absent. Their city was in ruins and their temple had been destroyed. It was while in this condition that they found God whom they had not known in their prosperity. In the first place the Jews had a spirit of patriotism. They were patriots and would fight for their country's honor, and it was this patriotism which saved them.

"In the next place they met trouble with a spirit of devotion. Most any man can be pious in trouble, but it is not everyone who can be pious in prosperity. In the third place they were religious. When all else had fled they sought God.

"Their temple was demolished and their sacrifice had ceased, but from horror they stretched their hand to the Daughter of Zion and they wept when they remembered her. Patriotism and Religion are the two essential qualities. If these depart and decay a nation will die. Rome was made great by them and she would be still been great if they had been retained. These two forces are inseparable.

"If a man is nothing but virtuous he is sure to have the vices of his own virtue, and we would gladly give him a ticket to leave town by the first train. A man with nothing but a conscience is a monstrosity. It is necessary that he possess a little judgment.

"Nowadays if a preacher talks over a half hour his people want to shut up the church. Let God into the hearts of the people and all things else will be right. Sooner or later we shall see that the party leaders must stand back for the country's honor. The time is coming when every patriotic men will join in hurling the demagogues from the earth.

"Some of us remember the struggle of 1861-'65, when our sons and fathers left their homes to defend the flag which had been fired upon. We must have a patriotism that will take us to the ballot box to vote for God and not the head or even tail of a ticket.

"Evil forces are fast falling in on us. The Bible is being crowded out of our public schools and their is infidelity. But the world is not stronger than the church and I will stand on that statement against all comers. Think of the city missions of today with their wonderful influence saving lost souls. Think of the stupendous force of the Y. M. C. A., and Sunday schools. The latter has a membership of 12,000,000 children today.

"God reigns and the flag flies! Think of the Christian Endeavor Epworth League, B. Y. P. U., American Volunteers, Salvation Army, and the educational forces. God is at the front with the starry flag overhead!

"Lately we have been against the foe. I am not a politician of the lowest sense, but of the highest, and I care for my country. The people of the present day will always remember the campaign just passed. It was not one man against another, nor one platform against another, but a fight for country, and in the midst of it arose the flag. God run his hand through anarchy, riot and ruin, and when the result was known the next morning how the people did shout and thank God. Through the struggle the newspaper and pulpit came over for sound money. When Democrats, who were slyed in the wool, saw that their platform had left true Democracy they joined in the great fight. The Supreme Court was attacked and there was an attempt at class hatred. The campaign of education has just begun. We should educate through the press and pulpit and settle all things in the behalf of God and country.

"Let us have the biggest navy in the world and let us inform the people that we mean business. Then there will be no Venezuelan or Armenian questions. With the flag at the front, the day of promise will dawn. Up with the flag, up with the cross and God will bless the men who stand for country." After the discourse Rev. H. C. Johnston offered prayer. A collection, as usual, was taken for the Relief Association. "America" and the doxology was sung and Dr. Lowry pronounced the benediction. As the people was leaving the church, one woman in speaking about Dr. Lowry's sermon remarked that she only wished she could have cheered during the discourse.

In spite of the threatening weather, there was a large attendance at the Thanksgiving service held in the Crescent Avenue Presbyterian church at 10:30 Thursday morning. Rev. Wm. R. Richards, D. D., conducted the opening exercises, assisted by Rev. Mr. Main. William E. MacKy-ront acted as organist, and two anthems were charmingly sung by the choir. An offering was taken for the Relief Association, Dr. Richards saying that it was in accordance with one clause of President Cleveland's Thanksgiving Proclamation, which he had just read.

The sermon of the morning was delivered by Rev. John Wilbur Richardson, from the text "What Hath God Wrought!" Numbers 21:23. It was an account of God's marvellous care for and blessing of our nation. Providence, he said, is not a strong enough term to describe the progress of the American people. Other peoples with their opportunities of centuries have not accomplished what we have in our 275 years. Look at Spain, with her long history; how she has degenerated and decayed, instead of progressing. Contrast Mexico with the United States. It was settled long before the Pilgrims landed, by men who had the wealth and resources of Europe behind them, and who were opening up a country where no storms of winter could trouble them, and whose wealth was sufficient for the needs of whole nations. But what progress have they made? They have had no inventors, no scientists, no intellectual activity; their government is despised everywhere, and their name a synonym for bigotry. But our country, settled by a handful of pioneers, living in their log cabins, has been the child of Providence. The wealth of the United States is sufficient to buy up whole European States. Two hundred years ago Great Britain was the greatest among nations, while this country, a mere chip of the old block, was cutting its wisdom teeth. But now the son has more energy than the sire.

"Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it." Oh, that men would praise our God, for His wonderful works to the children of men!

The foundations of our republic were laid at noonday. There is nothing vague and unknown in American history. Our forefathers were divinely inspired how to build up an enlightened nation. The free school is the cradle of American manhood. The conquests of books will outlast those of armies. Education is the foot that rocks the world. It is boys educated in our common schools that become our statesmen, authors, inventors and generals. Abraham Lincoln, a backwoods boy, taught by a backwoods teacher to read and write, rose to guide the storm tossed ship of State safely into port.

Our native born theologians are as well trained, our lawyers as adroit, our mechanics better informed than those of other countries. Our citizens are all trained up to bear their part in our country's government; a government that needs the help of neither king, Pope or czar.

On Nov. 3d there was given a greater proof than ever before of the perpetuity of American manhood. American manhood has not deteriorated. The independent voter guards the pass to the American Thermopylae. All hail to the noble millions who exalt principles above parties.

We reach ideals quickly on American soil. Financial and social troubles, war clouds, political crisises, are only temporary. Above, the Lord omnipotent reigneth.

We must not forget to give thanks for individual mercies. It pleased God to loan you all you possess. You have been protected, fed, clothed and given comparative health. Perhaps business reverses have come to you, but the blessings far outnumber the shadows.

In every case there is cause for thanksgiving today, even in the case of those to whom bereavement has come. Let us give thanks that we have had these dear ones with us, and that we shall have them again in the Home beyond the river.

Many Licenses Wanted.

It seems to be the general impression that there will be some tall skirmishing for liquor licenses at Scotch Plains in the spring. It is understood that in all there will be eight applications, and in each applicant must have twelve freeholders' signatures on his application, this means 96 signers out of a total of 303 registered voters.

Lost Their Jobs.

Three employes of the street railway have been discharged for various offending causes, and their places have been filled by three men from the waiting list.

A HORRIBLE EXPERIENCE

LOCKED UP IN A FREIGHT CAR FOR SEVEN DAYS WITHOUT FOOD.

A Tramp Sealed in a Car at Ottawa, Canada, Nov. 21th. With Just Room Enough to Stand, Only Got Out Today

The heavy door of the freight car was pushed back, and J. D. Loizeaux, of the firm of Rushmore & Co., the Watchung avenue lumber dealers, prepared to examine the contents of the car which had just arrived from Ottawa, Canada. But he was not prepared for what followed. There was a stir inside of the car and a man appeared at the entrance. His tattered clothing hung loosely on the gaunt form. His eyes were sunken deep in his head, while his face was as pale as a ghost under the stubby beard that covered most of it. He staggered to the door and once more breathed the fresh air after being locked in a space scarcely more than a foot wide, for seven long days without food or drink. It was a singular example of the wonderful endurance of the "knight of the road," for such was the unexpected visitor that so startled Mr. Loizeaux when he broke the metallic seal and opened the freight car early this morning.

The car came from Ottawa, Canada, and the bill of lading shows that it was sealed on Nov. 21st, just a week ago. The car, which was loaded with lumber, had no ventilating holes, and the only fresh air that reached the prisoner was that which entered the cracks in the side of the car. It was dark, very dark in there, and the only empty space was between the piles of lumber, and that was hardly over a foot in width. Here the traveler had to stand, always facing the same direction, and if he lay down he could not turn around but had to on his side. The space was so small that Mr. Loizeaux, who is rather a slim man himself, could not squeeze in.

He presented a terrible appearance as he staggered out, and the marks of hunger were plainly written on his face. Mr. Loizeax assisted him from the car, and then the stranger sat down and, in a feeble voice, told his story.

His home was in Brooklyn, he said, and he wanted to return from Canada. He got into the car when it started and took a little something to eat with him. It wasn't much, he explained, and he drawn face and fleshless form bore evidence to that remark. He didn't give his name but finally staggered to his feet and slowly made his way out of the lumber shed a d went down the street. The last that Mr. Loizeaux saw of his unexpected visit or was when he walked with uneven steps along East Fourth street in the direction of Park avenue.

The case is a remarkable one, and the only wonder is that the man did not starve to death. His position, cramped up in that small space, must have been terrible. There were no signs of any food or drink in the car after the stranger departed.

MESSENGER WON THIS TIME.

Friends Prevent His Being Molested by a Central Railroad Detective.

As A. S Stevenson, the Somerville express messenger, who has been fighting the Central Railroad and the United States Express Company for the last six months over the carrying of parcels on the Central trains, went through the train sheds in Jersey City Tuesday to take the express for home, a railroad detective stepped up to him and said, pointing to two packages Stevenson carried: "You can't get on this train with those, and if you attempt to do so I will arrest you as a disorderly person."

Two friends of Stevenson, one an insurance man and the other a manufacturer, who heard the conversation, stepped forward, and, each taking a package from Stevenson, got on the train, telling Stevenson to follow them. He did so, unmolested, nor could the officer molest the two men who took the parcels unless he prevented every person with a package from getting on the train. The only thing left for the railroad company to do is to prevent persons from boarding their trains with parcels.

Ran a Needle in Her Finger.

Miss May Squires, of Harmony street, met with a painful accident on Wednesday. She was using a sewing machine and the needle penetrated her finger. Before she could remove the piece of steel, it broke off, leaving a portion of it in the finger. She was taken to Dr. Mathewson's office where the doctor gave proper treatment.

Cut Her Nose.

Mrs. Bothwell, of this city, met with a serious accident Tuesday night She was walking along Park avenue when she tripped over a rise in the sidewalk, near the railroad bridge, where it was being repaired, and fell. Her nose was severely cut and she lost a large amount of blood. She was taken to Dr. Lohge's for treatment.

—After giving the wrong person credit twice, it is now stated that it was Michael Kennedy, the hackman, who found and returned the money to Mrs. Rafferty, of Willow avenue, and was rewarded for his honesty.

THE CORPS INSPECTED.

WINFIELD SCOTT POST RELIEF CORPS VISITED.

The Working Order of the Auxiliary Found to be in Excellent Condition—A Social Time Enjoyed After Business.

The annual inspection of Winfield Scott Post Relief Corps, No. 10, took place Thursday, and it was a memorable occasion. Inspecting Officer Mrs. Hill, of Trenton, assisted by several Department Officers, were present, and they were exceedingly well pleased with the workings of the corps. It was announced by the visiting officers that the Bayard Corps, of Trenton, was the largest in the department, but the corps in this city was by far the best working corps.

After the inspection the meeting was thrown open, and members of Post 73, G. A. R., and the Sons of Veterans were invited to join in the social features of the affair. Mrs. Brokaw, the president of the corps, occupied the chair, with Commander McVoy, of Post 73, on her left and First Lieutenant Charles F Stephens, of the Sons of Veterans, on her right. Remarks were then made by a number of those present, including the Department Officers, Mrs. Morse, Mrs. Hill and Mrs. McVoy, Mrs. Westphal, Mrs. Cox. Mrs. Woodruff, Mrs. Dobbins, Commander McVoy and Past Commander Dobbins. Recitations were given by Comrade W. R. Mattox and H. S. Thatcher. Charles F. Stephens also made a few remarks. A vocal duet, "Put me off at Buffalo," was then effectively rendered by Mrs. Clarence Leland and Miss Nash.

At this point Department President Mrs. Mose gave a brief outline of the workings and growth of the department and stated that the present membership of the Department of New Jersey was 140,000. The department, she further said, was organized June 3d, 1883, and since that time over one million dollars had been raised, and during the last year $3,821.34 had been given to the G. A. R., of this State, and that $868.26 had been contributed for Memorial Day work.

At the conclusion of the speeches, songs, etc., the women served all with excellent refreshments.

EARNEST ENDEAVORERS.

A THANKSGIVING SERVICE HELD YESTERDAY MORNING.

E. E. Anthony Spoke of the Things to be Thankful For and Their Seeming Ingratitude of Christian People to the Giver.

A heavy mist hung over the city, Thursday morning, at 9.30 o'clock, the time appointed for the Union Christian Endeavor service in the chapel of the Crescent Avenue Church, but the meeting was fairly well attended, and was very earnest and solemn, and was thoroughly enjoyed. Edward E. Anthony, President of the Plainfield Local Union, was the leader of the meeting, and Miss Carrie Dewey presided at the piano. An opening song service was followed by prayers by Rev. Mr. Main and Mr. Anthony, the responsive reading of a psalm, and a short but very earnest talk from the leader. He spoke of the many things for which one should give thanks, and then of the seeming ingratitude of Christian people toward the Giver of all good. He drew a strong lesson from the story of the ten lepers who came to Christ to be cleansed, only one of whom returned to thank Him.

"Leprosy is a frightful disease," he said, "but we have been cleansed of a worse one,—sin. Have we thanked Him as we ought? And don't you believe that if those men had any friends who were lepers, they brought them to be cleansed also? Let us show our thankfulness not only by word, but also by deed, bearing to others the news of what Christ has done for us. Let us this day consecrate ourselves to this winter's evangelistic work."

When the meeting was thrown open, there was no time wasted. No testimonies were given, but many earnest, heartfelt prayers were offered, thanking the Father for His many gifts, temporal and spiritual, and asking that the Endeavorers might be truly thankful, and show their thankfulness by whole-hearted work for Him.

At the close of the meeting, Mr. Anthony gave notice of a week of Bible study in preparation for evangelistic work, to begin December 6. Then, after a closing hymn, the Endeavorers separated, most of them attending the preaching service which followed.

In the evening the members of the company partook of a sumptuous dinner at the Cycl-Academy. The dinner was prepared by the members wives and it was a fine spread. During the feast there were speeches, and songs by the members and the whole affair was one of great pleasure. The guests from Bayonne who were expected, could not come owing to many of them being away.

A man named Henderson, living at Coontown, was riding his wheel through Somerset street, Wednesday evening, and when he reached Manning avenue, both he and the wheel collided with a trolley car. The car was stopped as quickly as possible, but the man did not escape injury. He received a cut over the left eye and his left hand was badly injured. Officials of the street railway told Henderson to go to Dr. Zeglio and have his wounds dressed and they would settle the bill. The accident was undoubtedly the fault of Henderson who was riding to close to the car tracks.

AWAY FOR A LONG TIME.

Rev. Hunter Corbett, a Returned Missionary, Speaks.

The chapel of the Crescent Avenue church contained a very large audience Wednesday evening when Rev. Hunter Corbett, a returned missionary from China, was present and told something of his work in that foreign field. The speaker said that he left America the same day that the battle of Gettysburg was commenced and that this was the first time he had seen his own country since. He related some very interesting experiences that were amusing to those present. He claimed that the Presbyterian church was doing a great work in China and that that denomination has cause for thankfulness. He urged that more workers be sent into the field and that more money be contributed to save the perishing souls. He said that the natives were hungering and thirsting for knowledge concerning Christ and that they were truly anxious to be saved from their sins. Mr. Corbett is a magnetic speaker and his earnest words touched the hearts of nearly all present. At the close a collection was taken for the work.

A Grand Sermon.

To hear Dr. Upham, of whose preaching so much had been said, a large congregation gathered last Wednesday evening in Grace M. E. church. His text was taken from Mark's Gospel, 14th chapter, verses 8 and 9. As an introduction to his sermon, he first related the incident which took place in Bethany. Though spending some in thus describing, he said he had no apology to offer for thus taking the time, as he believed he was but obeying the command of Christ contained in these verses. The divisions of the sermon then followed. First, The woman's great faith—"She did it for Me." Second, Union with Christ brings us during fame—"Wheresoever this Gospel shall be preached, etc.," verse 9. Third, Christ is pleased when we attempt anything for Him. Elaborating each thought in order, the preacher concluded with a touching incident of human devotion.

At St. Stephen's Church.

Thanksgiving day in St. Stephen's church was celebrated by a service of Holy Communion at 7.30 a. m. and morning prayer and sermon at 10.30. The decorations were under the direction of Mrs. Dyett, and proved very effective and appropriate. Wheat, and fruit and vegetables, were present in profusion; yet so arranged as not to be obtrusive. The Rector, Rev. P. P. Simpson, preached a sermon from the text "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." The lessons drawn from these words were thoroughly appropriate to the season. After the services were ended, the various offering of fruit were sent to the sick of the Parish, and the other donations distributed. The service throughout were well attended. Were one takes into consideration the threatening condition of the water.

The Earnest Workers, the boys' mission band of the Crescent Avenue church, held a meeting Tuesday afternoon in the church parlors, to which their friends were invited. The meeting was addressed by Miss Sarah A. Stout, a returned missionary from India.

The meeting was presided over by the president, Edward Janes, while the secretary, George Richards, read his report. The report of the treasurer, Brockholdat Miller, was also made. Mrs. Isaac L. Miller made a few remarks in which she told that the band had been in existance for ten years and during that time had raised over $300. The band now has fourteen active members on its roll. Mrs. Miller then introduced Miss Stout.

She told something of her work in India and described the manners, customs and dress of the natives. She referred to their religion and touched on their idols. WOMEN SOCIETY OF THE SEVENTH DAY BAPTIST CHURCH ENTERTAIN.

They Give Another of Their Delightful Socialines—A Literary and Musical Programme and a Bountiful Supper.

There is one thing that the Seventh-Day Baptist church should be thankful for and that is their very energetic organization, the Women's Society for Christian Work. That society held another of its delightful sociables on Wednesday evening in the church parlors, which was well attended by old and young. Early in the evening a bountiful supper was served and at 8 o'clock the entertainment began. The programme opened with a piano trio by Mrs. Ross, Mrs. Hubbard and Miss Bessie Titsworth, which was well rendered. Charles P. Titsworth made his debut as a speaker by giving a short recitation and did it in a manner that bids fair to make him as delightful a speaker as his father. A vocal solo was rendered in an artistic manner by Miss Mere lith, and then a farce, entitled "Rather Mix d," was acted by Mrs. Joseph Miller as school teacher, and the Misses Marie Rogers, Bertha Mitchell, Edith Titsworth, Bessie Dunham, Kizzie Naegle and Nellie Miller. It was supposed to represent a scene in a country school the day before Thanksgiving, and the exceedingly lively effects of the promise of vacation were portrayed in a very lifelike manner.

Another vocal solo, "Mobile," was given by Miss Meredith, and then Miss Maud Mosher read a selection, "The Overruling of Miss Deborah," in a pleasing manner. The entertainment closed with two whistling solos, "The Nightingale" and "Raleigh Two-step," by Miss Meredith.

The committee that arranged this delightful entertainment consisted of Mrs. Albert Ross, Mrs. Joseph Miller, and Miss Bessie Titsworth. The refreshments were provided by a committee composed of Mrs. A. H. Lewis and Mrs. Charles Randolph.

MR. MARCLAY NOT TO BLAME.

Wagoners Used His Property Three Years Without Paying Rent.

Since the description of miserable hut in which the family of Jeptha Wagoner lived appeared in The Press, many people have no doubt been prone to criticise M. F. Marclay, the owner of the property for having rented such a place. But Mr. Marclay is entirely blameless for the condition, and, as a matter of fact, had he been a hardhearted man the family might have been even worse off than they were. Three years ago Wagoner went to Mr. Marclay and asked to rent the place, which contained the building and 17 acres of land. Mr. Marclay told him that the house was not in condition for a family to occupy, but that in a few days he would visit the place with him and look over the house and if it could be repaired for a reasonable sum, he would fix it up. Two weeks after that Wagoner visited Mr. Marclay and told him that he had moved into the house. The latter told him that he had no authority to do this and besides the house was not comfortable for his family. Wagoner claimed to be handy at repairing and said that he would fix up the house and take it out in rent. Mr. Marclay insisted on his moving out, and Wagoner left in a state of mind. He continued to use the house, however, and never paid a cent of rent. In addition to this he used a large amount of wood taken off the property. Mr. Marclay had never been in the house since it was occupied by Wagoner and did not know just how bad it was. Mr. Marclay feels very sorry for the family, but feels that he should not be criticised in the matter.

She had no desire whatever to see her friends.

GOSPEL OF THE KORAN

ALEXANDER RUSSELL WEBB LECTURES ON A PAGAN RELIGION.

Explained Various Ways in Which People of the Orient Worship—May Have Four Wives, But One is Usually Enough.

A fair sized audience gathered at Salvation Army hall Friday night to hear Alexander Russell Webb, the convert to the Mohammadam religion. This was Mr. Webb's second visit to this city. His first appearance was at Reform Hall a few years ago.

His object is to present the religion he represents in an intelligent manner so that his hearers may know and understand what true Mohammedism is. He mentioned several peculiarities about his people such as regarding their manner of prayer. They pray five times each day and their last petition is offered just before retiring. In their method of washing they bathe three times in succession and in such a way that the water is not used again. They also bathe the mouth three times so that their words may be clean. When the call to prayer is given every morning before sun rise there is a death-like stillness. It is given in the Arabic language. Mr. Webb imitated the prayer and style of position. The prayer is lengthy and has a sameness about it. The other four prayers slightly differ.

In the Koran language there are ninety nine different names given to God and anyone who can repeat them them 100 times is highly commended by the prophet. Friday as Sunday by the Mohammedans and a different prayer is used on that day.

Mr. Webb was dressed in the gown of a merchant. He said that there were seventy-three divisions among his people and the dress of each division represents the religion. The speaker then retired and appeared later attired as a Turk. In speaking of the Koran, which is considered a sacred book, he said that every child was obliged to learn it, after which the commentaries and language are taught. Each person usually has a library and one lawyer which Mr. Webb spoke of has a library containing 3 000 volumes of the Koran bound in silk and ivory.

The people use no knives or forks and yet they get along exceedingly well. The custom is that a guest at the table is supposed to eat something of everything on the table.

It is a rare thing, the speaker said, that you find a man with more than one wife. The law of the people is that he shall not have more than four. Boys and girls are not allowed to associate with each other hence there is no courting. When a man wants a wife he asks his mother to get him one. The son then calls on the girl's father and if all is well a contract is drawn up and signed. A sumptuous feast follows, then the marriage.

Mr. Webb said that it was considered a disgrace for a woman to play a piano or guitar, but occasionally among the higher classes women do play these instruments.

The speaker thought there were many things about the Mohammedan religion that were beautiful, and then on the other hand there are things which are not advantageous.

LOST THE TRI-STATE TROPHY.

Charles Smith Defeated by William Wolstenecroft by a Score of 77 to 74.

The tri-State silver trophy for expert trap shooters was lost Friday afternoon by Charles Smith, of this city, to William Wolstenecroft, of Frankford, Pa., in contest at 100 birds, the score being 77 to 74 in favor of Wolstenecroft. The match was shot on the grounds of the Climax Gun Club at Fanwood. Expert rules prevailed. Immediately after his defeat, Mr. Smith challenged the winner for a match to be shot in December, the trophy being a challengeable one each month. No date was set, but the contest will take place on the grounds of the Keystone Shooting League, of which Wolstenecroft is a member.

The cup is valued at $50 and was won by the latter in 1901. Mr. Smith at Americus, Ga., last month, when he defeated eight other contestants. The championship includes the States of New Jersey, New York and Pennsylvania.

Chicken Coop Destroyed.

An alarm of fire, sent in from box 153, called out the borough fire department at 2:30 Saturday a. m. The fire was discovered by Night Watchman Frank Hull. When the department arrived, which was about four minutes after the alarm, the firemen discovered that a chicken coop and an outhouse located on property occupied by Samuel Hull, corner of Grove street and Greenbrook road. Chief Marshal Wilson was the first person to arrive at the fire and it was through his efforts that the adjoining barns were saved. The firemen soon had water on the fire and extinguished the same quickly. Mr. Hull is inclined to think that the buildings were set on fire, but he has no knowledge as to who did it. The chickens in the coop were all saved.

WOMEN WANT TO VOTE.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE STATE WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION.

Mrs. Florence Howe Hall Re-elected President—A Colorado Woman Tells of Woman's Suffrage in Her State.

The sixteenth annual meeting of the New Jersey State Woman's Suffrage Association was held in Union Hall, Orange, Friday afternoon, and a large number of members were present. Mrs. Florence Howe Hall, of this city, presided.

The reports from the different counties in the State showed an encouraging growth in the sentiment in the favor of woman suffrage. It was stated that the association was working in the direction of bringing the schools in some parts of the State into proper working legal condition.

The election resulted in the choice of the following officers for the ensuing year: President, Mrs. Florence Howe Hall, of Plainfield; vice president, Mrs. Harriet Lincoln Cavidge, of East Orange; recording secretary, Mrs. Alice C. Angell, of Passaic; corresponding secretary, Dr. Mary D. Hussey, of East Orange; treasurer Mrs. Stephen R. Krom, of Plainfield; auditor, Mrs. J. M. Pullen, of Camden.

Mrs. Howard S. Stansbury, of Denver, was introduced, and in reply to questions gave some interesting facts in relation to woman suffrage in Colorado. It has been a most unqualified success, she said. While there was about twice as many men as women in the State, yet at the last election the women cast 51 per cent of the vote. Of the men, only 75 per cent registered and 60 per cent voted, while of the women 94 per cent registered and 84 per cent vote. Mrs. Stansbury stated that the more ignorant women did not vote. The bill that had recently passed the Legislature raising the age of consent to eighteen years had been introduced by a woman member of the Legislature and pushed through largely by the influence of women.

PASSED A TIME OF PLEASURE.

Epworth Leaguers Know How to Entertain Pleasantly.

The social and entertainment given in Grace M. E. church Friday night, under the auspices of the Epworth League, proved to be a pleasant affair The programme opened with a reading by Miss Emma Stevens, which was followed by a number of charades entitled "Not by a Jug Full," "United We Stand, Divided We Fall," "Cauliflower," "Baltimore" and "Bicycle." This part of the programme was very laughable. A dialogue, "Deaf as a Post," was rendered by Miss Grace Carroll, Miss Alice Carroll, Miss Margaret Schuck and Dyckman Winckler. The balance of the evening was devoted to the playing of game and the eating of ginger snaps and apples.

The literary committee of the league, consisting of Miss Margaret Schuck, the Misses Carroll, Mrs E. E. Winckler, Miss Lizzie Stafford, Miss Alice Loomis, Mrs. H. J. Johnston and John Steiner, arranged the programme, while the social committee, consisting of Mrs. Most, Miss Clara Steiner, the Misses Carrie and Agnes Tingley, Miss Cora VanArsdale and Miss Georgia VanArsdale, served refreshments.

WONDERFUL QUILTING BEE.

Material Used That is Associated With Historical Fact.

About fifty years ago the friends of Mrs. Sarah Lines, daughter of the late Ephraim Vail, of Greenbrook, presented her with blocks for an old-fashioned album quilt. When Mrs. Lines left the old homestead at Greenbrook about a year ago she gave the blocks to her niece, Mrs. Mercy R. Vail, of Orchard place, this city, and Friday some of the friends of Mrs. Vail met at her home for an old-fashioned quilting. The blocks are a curiosity, many of them being made of material that is over 100 years old, and among the names inscribed upon them are those of representative members of the Society of Friends of the early part of the century. One bears the name of Edward Fitz Randolph, born in 1700. He was the father of the man who piloted Gen. Washington to the rock which still bears his name. One of the blocks bears the following inscription:

> May heaven defend my much-loved friend.
> May virtue's rules direct her ways,
> May angels fair, with guardian care,
> From every ill protect her.

Among the pioneers the following: Sarah S. Lines, Maria S. Harned, Phebe H Vail, Sidna R. Vail, Belle R. Vail, Kate F. Randolph, Mrs. Alfred R. Vail, Mrs. James Harned, Mr. and Mrs. E. J. Olsen and Margaret and Sarah Vail, of this city; Mrs. Henry C. Vail and Mrs. Frederick Wilcox, of Dunellen. An elaborate dinner was served at noon.

The Society is the One at Monroe Avenue Chapel, and the Members Acquitted Themselves Creditably for the Time.

The Juniors were in full possession at Monroe Avenue chapel Tuesday, for they were celebrating the first anniversary of the organization of the Junior Epworth League there. All the participants in the entertainment were, with few exceptions, members of the Junior League. Their friends showed their appreciation by coming in goodly numbers and filling every vacant seat. A small admission was charged and at the close of the entertainment the treasury of the League was enriched to the amount of $10.35. Miss Edith Robinson presided at the door and acted as cashier. Rev. W. C. O'Donnell acted as master of the ceremonies while the accompanist was Miss Charlotte Aldrich.

The members of the Junior League entered in a body, singing, and took seats together. Then follwed a delightful programme. George O. Stevens was as good as ever and Miss Ritta Pond recited in a very pleasing manner. The rest of the numbers were given by the Juniors, most of whom owed their excellent training to Miss Aldrich who spent much time and labor in preparing the Juniors for this entertainment. A WEEK OF PRAYER.

Local Christian Endeavorers Arrange for Special Services.

The Plainfield Local Union of the Christian Endeavor Society have arranged for a week of prayer to commence December 6th. The topic for each day is as follows:

Sunday—Our Field—Inform ourselves as to the needs and opportunities; Monday—The work of the Spirit; Tuesday—The Bible Idea of Service, Personal Work, etc.; Wednesday—The Gospel Plan of Salvation. Study carefully, Sin, Pardon, Faith, Repentance; Thursday—Answering objections of unbelievers; Friday—God's present call, and qualifying for service. Personal responsibility; Saturday—Power—A quiet hour, waiting upon God for the Power. Acts 1, 1-14, is suggested for special study.

The evangelistic committee make the following recommendations:

"If not possible to hold meetings every day, let every member devote at least a half an hour to prayer and study of the topics. Follow up the work of prayer and preparation by house to house visitation—invitation to non-church-goers to attend church services. A good example is a strong sermon on this topic that any Endeavorer can preach. Be regular attendants at all the services of your own church, particularly the church prayer-meeting and Sunday evening services. Don't go alone if you can help it, take some one to each service with you."

Miss Nora Rockwell has been home from boarding school at Sing Sing.

—Two applications for membership were received at the meeting of Perseverance Lodge, No. 74, Knights of Pythias, on Friday.

A SERICUS AFFAIR BETWEEN TWO PLAINFIELD MEN.

It is Alleged That T. J. Howell Kicked and Maltreated "Count" J. K. VanNest—Former Held For the Grand Jury.

A little dispute Friday morning between two neighbors ended in a lively quarrel and the serious injury of one of the participants, John K VanNest, more familiarly known as "Count." Arrest immediately followed and the affair promises to be a serious one for the offending neighbor.

Mr. VanNest lives on East Front street near Cole's Hill, and next door lives T. J. Hovell, a furniture dealer, doing business in New York. Mr. VanNest is a lawyer whose office is also in New York, but has been confined to his home for nearly a year. He can only move around with the aid of crutches, and yesterday morning at about 11 o'clock he was moving slowly about the yard when Mr. Hovell strolled by with a rifle over his shoulder. He was out on a hunting expedition, and on seeing Frank Soer, a lad employed by Mr. VanNest, he asked him to go over to his house as Mrs. Hovell wanted him to do an errand. Soar had often gone errands for the Hovell's, and so he started to go, when VanNest ordered him back. Then the latter remarked to Hovell that when he wanted the lad's services it would be a little more courteous to find out whether VanNest had any to say about it.

Hovell replied and other remarks of an uncomplimentary character followed. Hovell takes before Justice Newcorn in the evening on the charge of atrocious assault, and the Justice held him in $300 bail for the grand jury.

He said he was very much surprised at the arrest, as he did not suppose a little quarrel like this one between neighbors would be taken any notice of. He declared that he had merely acted in self defence, but the complainant's friends claim that the rough treatment that VanNest received was not necessary, as very little force was needed to overpower a crippled man in his condition.

Dr. Long attended the injured man and found VanNest's face and head badly bruised and swollen, while he was also suffering from several scalp wounds. There was a bad bruise on the back, said to be the result of a kick. His injuries are very serious and will confine him to his bed for some time. His jaws and mouth were so battered that he could scarcely speak. Besides having to answer the charge for atrocious assault, Hovell will probably find himself involved in a suit for damages.

Homeless Pigeons.

The freight house pigeons which have for a long time past been nurtured and cared for around the old freight house, are now homeless since the building has been removed. But a dozen or more of them still continue to hang about the old place, and pick up whatever grain and other things dropped which is appetizing to the birds.

THEATRICAL.

The story of "Jack and the Beanstalk," a new extravaganza at the Casino, in New York, has been touched from various sources in tale and verses. King Cole is saved from the Forty Thieves by Jack Hubbard, a son of Old Mother Hubbard, who wants to marry Cole's daughter, Mary. The King refuses and Jack, accompanied by Sinbad, climbs the magic Beanstalk and seeks his fortune. He eventually finds it and incidentally a family tree, and marries the King's daughter and all ends happily. It has been a very long time since New York theatre goers have seen such a piece put on the stage so gorgeously. One fine example of scenic art succeeds another all through the evening. It is lively and ingenious, occasionally humorous, almost constantly admirable as a spectacle, and commendably free from even the suspicion of real impropriety. Every joke, scenic, mechanical, musical or verbal is in the right place.

THE RESULT.

As was expected, the Republicans were victorious in the city election. But it was not such a victory as they expected when they put their ticket in the field. In Mr. Martine they found a strong opponent, and the Democrats retire in defeat much stronger than they were when they entered the contest. The fact of Mr. Fisk running behind his ticket was not a reflection on his own popularity and ability so much as a rebuke administered by those who feel that the administration with which he has been identified is not just what it ought to be to their minds. As The Press has already stated, Mr. Fisk is fully capable of performing the important and responsible duties of the city's chief executive, and his administration will be an honorable one.

Weather Prophet DeVoe says we won't cut ice in New Jersey before February. But what he says don't always 'cut ice."

Just one more month and then not another leap year till 1904. Hurry up, girls, a month of procrastination may make you an old maid for the rest of your life.

No less a great personage than President Cleveland has confirmed the idea that New Jersey is "the" place to live in, for the chief executive has purchased a residence at Princeton and there will make his home after he retires from the White House.

The New York State Superintendent of Public Instruction, has decided that while a School Board may employ members of a Roman Catholic sisterhood as teachers, these should not while teaching, wear their peculiar garb, nor should they be addressed by their religious title, "Sister." The decision is based not on specific law but on the general policy of the department as to sectarian associations in schools.

Another effort will be made at Trenton in January to have the State regulate the hours for barbering on Sunday. About one half of the tonsorial artists want all shops closed at noon; others prefer to have the day entirely to themselves, while others, still, would willingly work all day. If a law is passed fixing the hours there can be no injurious opposition, and each barber shop will have an equal show for the Sunday patronage.—New York Press.

Last Tuesday Rev. Dwight L. Moody, who is conducting a series of revival meeting in New York, made a fervent appeal for a collection to be used in buying Thanksgiving dinners for the poor of New York. The collection amounted to $316 15. A few weeks ago Rev. A. H. Simpson, who addressed a meeting in this city last Tuesday, made an appeal to a New York audience for contributions to the heathen in South America, Africa and Turkey. He was rewarded by a collection of $120,000. The difference in favor of the foreign heathen is in the ratio of 1,000 to 1.

The school census shows that in Union county there are 20,929 children between 5 and 18 years of age; an increase of 1,377 over last year. In the state the total number of children of school age is 438,960, an increase of 14,000 over 1895. Of this number 45,021 attend private schools and 89,201 do not attend any school at all. There are in the state 1,581 children over ten years of age who are unable to read. Of the children who have not yet reached their fifteenth year there are 5,560 at work in stores, mines and factories.

Supreme Court Justice Bennet VanSyckle is a candidate for reappointment. His term expires in February. For some unexplained reason Justice VanSyckel has made himself unpopular with both Democrats and Republicans. The latter will oppose his reappointment because they think there should be a majority of Republicans in the Supreme Court, and VanSyckle's place will just make it, besides, should the constitutional amendment reorganizing the higher courts be approved by the voters next year. VanSyckle, if reappointed, would in a year or two be the highest judicial officer in New Jersey, as, because of their years, it is improbable that either Chief Justice Beasley or Justice Depue will be reappointed.

BLEW OPEN THE SAFE.

BURGLARS VISIT A SCOTCH PLAINS BUSINESS MAN.

The Identity of the Thieves is Unknown, But They Must Have Been Professionals—No Valuable Booty Secured.

The butcher shop of John B. Marsh, at Scotch Plains, was entered by burglars some time Sunday morning, presumably about 3 o'clock, and robbed, but the booty did not pay the robbers for their trouble. The safe was a staunch one and the door was drilled and opened by the use of dynamite or giant powder. The tools left behind were a bracing bit, a chisel and three punches. The door of the safe was blown across the room, some twelve feet, and striking the wall on the opposite side made an indention in the wall.

Yesterday morning Mr. Marsh had the door of the safe carried into the street where it was viewed by many persons. The robbers were evidently professionals for they had stolen three blankets, one from William Stansbury's barn and the other two from "Ben" Elliott's blacksmith shop. These were wrapped around the safe to deaden the sound when it went off. The only things missing were the account books.

Mr. Marsh heard the explosion, but he thought it was the drilling going on in the mountain, so he paid no particular attention to the noise.

Mr. Marsh went to his shop about 6 a. m. in the morning and found the safe wide open, and the door laying on the floor.

Wilbur Miller, who lives near the Plains, came up from Plainfield Saturday night on the 11:34 train and saw two suspicious looking characters alight from a coal train. He followed them for a ways and then being alone and without firearms started away without seeing where they went.

The next Legislature will be composed of eighteen Republicans out of twenty-one Senators and fifty-six Republicans out of sixty Assemblyman. A too heavy majority oft times proves disastrous to the dominant party.

Dr. Charles Hunter, proprietor of the Hunter Sanitarium, at Netherwood, feels that an injustice has been done the enterprise by the publication of the charges of his brother, and today on another page of the Press the former gives his side of the trouble.

J. Frank Fort has been appointed by Gov. Griggs Judge of the Court of Common Pleas of Essex County, to succeed Andrew Kirkpatrick. Judge Fort practices law in Newark. He presided at the convention that nominated Gov. Griggs, and also at the Republican State Convention of 1888. He was a Judge of the First District Court at Newark from 1878 to 1881. As a delegate to the Republican National Convention he was chairman of the committee on credentials and later made the speech nominating Hobart. He will begin his duties at once.

Early to bed, early to rise makes a man healthy, wealthy and wise—An Old saw.

A Belle Mead bicyclist on Monday for yesterday he got out of bed before daylight, and just in time to escape the force of a large area of the ceiling, which fell with force enough to destroy furniture and other articles in the room. Had Morpheus pursued his seductive charms longer the man might have been seriously hurt; and, at the least, he would have been mad. And this would not have been wise for Sunday.

Poor man! Still there is something to live for. For years untold he has paid his good money to see things of beauty, but somehow he has never got what he paid for. And all because of the milliners' art and fad of stylish women to don voluptuous headgear. Now, however, the men—the backers, the promoters, the managers, the ones that "do it all"—have been stirred to a sense of pity and indice to their fellow creatures, and are demanding the ladies to take off their hats in public places of amusement. The movement for the emancipation of man from misery while in a theatre or other place where there are things to see beside the wings, plumes and heads of the martyred feathered tribe, is but in its infancy, but we all say amen to it.

A Complete Surprise.

A very pleasant surprise was arranged and given in honor of Miss Helen Cuming at her home on Putnam avenue, Friday evening. The young lady was completely surprised. The evening was spent pleasantly by playing games, singing and dancing. At midnight a collation was served and the party broke up in the wee small hours.

Starving children

There are children without food. They cry for it, and are not answered. The pity of it! But often nature cries out in other ways that her children need nourishment. Is your child thin; actually poor in flesh? Does it get no benefit from its food? Then give something which produces flesh and makes rich blood.

A Quiet Marriage.

The marriage of Mrs. Blake, formerly an assistant at Muhlenberg Hospital, and W. W. Hall, was celebrated Saturday night at the home of the groom 146 West Fifth street. The ceremony was performed by Rev. G. Kennedy Nowell, pastor of Hope Chapel, and only the nearest friends of the contracting parties were present. An informal reception followed the ceremony after which a wedding supper was served.

The Season of Surprises.

Miss Clara Ward, of West Front street, was tendered a surprise at her home on Saturday evening. Her sister, Mrs. Thomas S. Randolph arranged the surprise which was complete in every detail, as the surprised had no knowledge, whatever, of the affair. The evening was devoted chiefly to playing games, while some of the guests rendered vocal and instrumental music. Those present were Mr. and Mrs. E. E. Anthony, Mr. and Mrs. J. Howard Leggett, Mrs. D. W. Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. T. C. Smith, Miss Ernestine Smith, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. VanDyke, Mrs. T. S. Randolph and family, Mr. and Mrs. C. H. SOCIETY BUD BLOSSOMS

BRILLIANT COMING OUT OF MISS FLORENCE WARING.

The Home of Her Parents Presented a Handsome Scene With its Wealth of Stylish Gowns Becoming the Fair Guests.

Brilliant and charming was the debut of Miss Florence Waring, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Orville T. Waring, which occured at their home, 900 Park avenue, Saturday afternoon, from 4 to 7 o'clock.

The palatial home was the scene of wealth, beauty and culture, and the affair was a social triumph in every particular. The decorations were confined chiefly to the parlor, where the art of the florist was displayed to the best advantage.

There was arranged in a massive bank the choicest roses and chrysanthemums, while the southern smilax was given a prominent place. The accomplished debutant exquisitely gowned in white satin and chiffon, was introduced by her mother, who was richly gowned in black jet over satin. Those who assisted were Miss Elizabeth Heferts, of New York, in a gown of blue silk trimmed with white lace; Miss Lillian Weller, of Newburgh-on-the-Hudson, gowned in white silk and yellow chiffon; Miss Darlington, of Pittsburg, in a gown of yellow taffeta; Miss Clephane, of Englewood, gowned in white satin and tulle; Miss Gertrude Alexandre, of Philadelphia, in a gown of white taffeta and lace; Miss Katherine Reinhart, of Netherwood, in a gown of yellow satin; Miss Helen Mawie, of Philadelphia, in blue broadcloth; Miss Gertrude Andrews, of Plainfield, in pink and white silk; Miss Emma Schoonmaker, of Plainfield, in blue and white silk; Miss Waring, sister of the debutant, in white tulle with pink trimmings; Miss Ethel Stevens, Plainfield, in yellow satin; and Miss Nancy Lawson, of Plainfield, in white organdie.

Faster Time to be Made.

The march of improvement is noted at fire headquarters. The latest device is a button placed near each bed in the sleeping apartments, so that in case of fire at night each driver can have his horses under the harness by the time they reach the first floor. This arrangement saves valuable time when it is needed.

Your Idea

is that oatmeal is oatmeal—there can't be much difference.

But there can!

Even in ordinary oatmeals there can be a difference—good oats and good milling are better than lean and shrivelled oats and poor milling.

But oatmeal may be something more than a matter of fat groats and smart millers.

The oat in its natural state is the most nutritious of grains, but it must be adapted to man's physical needs. The starch cells—the indigestibility—must be broken.

Steam cooking will break the cells, change starch into sugar, make the indigestible digestible.

And there is such an oatmeal, steam-cooked.

DR. R. HUNTER'S SIDE

SAYS THERE IS NO BASIS FOR THE CLAIMS OF HIS BROTHER.

No Person, He Says, Has Had Authority at Any Time to Do Otherwise Than the Act Under His Personal Direction.

To the Editor of The Daily Press—

Your paper on November 25th contained an article regarding my sanitarium, at Netherwood, which is entirely uncalled for and untrue. For the benefit of my friends in Plainfield and New York, I wish to state that my sanitarium is now being and will continue to be conducted, as heretofore, under my own personal medical direction and supervision. No other person has at any time had any authority to do otherwise than follow out my directions. I engage and discharge all my medical assistants, as I think it best for my patients, in respect to which, the general public can have not the slightest interest. No other person has at any time had any interest or direction in the institution either as to its management or the method of treatment. My patients, of course, are interested in being properly attended to and when I, for any reason, have cause to think their welfare will be better promoted by my discharging any person in my employ, whether he be steward or assistant physician, I shall, as I have in the past, immediately discharge him.

My sanitarium at Netherwood should be of the greatest blessing to its patrons and of pecuniary benefit to Plainfield, but I want it distinctly understood that as I am the owner there is not and cannot be the slightest reason for the foolish and baseless claims set forth in your article which I regard as misleading to my patients and detrimental to the institution.

Yours etc.,

Robert Hunter, M. D.

SNOWSHOVELERS WINTER IN

UNDER JACK FROST'S TOUCH THE EARTH IS ROBED IN WHITE.

Four Inches of "The Beautiful" Fell Monday Night to Give First Real Taste of Winter—Traffic Was Not Impeded.

November is dying and the end is near at hand. Little December peeped in at the door ready to occupy the throne which is soon to be vacant, when Jack Frost appeared. Under his magic touch, the earth was robed in a shroud of glistening white for the dying king. Monday morning a drizzling rain set in as a continuation of Saturday's storm. At noon, the clouds appeared to be breaking and the sun came out rather feebly. Clearing and cold had said the weather prophets.

At about 3 o'clock a little rain set in; that soon changed to hail, and as soon as the air grew rapidly colder the first real snow storm of the season was at hand. All night it snowed light feathery flakes, that at first melted as soon as they reached the ground, but soon clung to whatever they touched, and houses, trees and even the few pedestrians that happened out were all robed in a mantle of white, Jack Frost's shroud for the dying month of November.

It was a moist, adhesive snow, and, as the blinking Plainfielder climbed from his warm couch early this morning, he found the city in possession of Winter, with the ground everything in ideal fashion. The snow was light and measured about four inches on the level. At Dunellen six inches of snow was reported. The snow was too light to impede traffic on the street railway and cars ran on schedule time. So much snow accumulated on the top of the gas reservoir that it was considered unsafe, and a force of men were put to work cleaning it off.

On the Jersey Central Railroad cars and locomotives alike had assumed a very wintry appearance, but ran on time. The platforms were slippery and the commuters seemed to realize that, for there were very few who attempted to jump on moving trains.

LOOKING FOR HIS SON.

Freight Car Prisoner Might Been the Right One, but He Wasn't.

A middle aged man named May came out to Plainfield from Brooklyn recently, in search of a long lost son, who had been missing from home he said, for the past seven weeks. The man met Charles McGinley at the depot early in the day and said he had read an account of a man in a freight car at Plainfield, and from the description given in the paper he was under the impression that it must be his son. Roundsman Mattox was notified and he directed the crestfallen father to Mr. Lolzeaux's house and then to the Liberty Street Mission where he was holding service, but from the description of the man found in the car and a photograph which Mr. May carried of his son, there seemed to be no resemblance, so the father returned to Brooklyn, without having gained any particulars concerning his lost son.

Mr. May said his son had the scarlet fever when he was quite young and that his mind was somewhat unbalanced. Unnoticed he had left home some time ago, and nothing had since been heard from him.

Sweet Melodies.

The special musical service at the First Baptist church last Sunday was attended by a large and appreciative audience. There were solos by Miss Luella C. Harris, soprano; Mrs. T. M. Ward, contralto; and Wm. Holmes, basso. The solo and chorus work was exceedingly fine. Dr. Yerkes, the pastor, gave a talk appropriate to Thanksgiving, which was in harmony with the musical part of the service.

Thankful.

The ladies of the Woman's Auxiliary Board of Muhlenberg Hospital desire to thank the donors for their very generous contributions to the Hospital on Thanksgiving Day.

JOINTS OF THE ARMOUR

REV. C. E. HERRING PREACHES ON THE WEAKNESSES OF YOUTH.

A Few of the Vulnerable Points of a Young Life Which May Strand the Character on the Sands of Failure

By request, Rev. Chas. E. Herring preached a sermon last Sunday on the subject "The Joints of the Armour." It was an able discourse and was thoroughly interesting. Mr. Herring spoke as follows:

"In Second Chronicles, 18, 33: 31, it is said that the King of Israel was wounded in the joints of his armour. That upon which he relied for protection did not save him, for an arrow found a place of entrance between the joints of the armour. Achilles was invulnerable except in the heel, and was slain there. Hagar slew Seigfried where the lime leaf touched his back, his only vulnerable place. Every man has some vulnerable place. It was only of Christ that it could be said: 'The Prince of this world cometh and findeth nothing in Me.' Temptation in life comes along the line of least resistance. Life is resistance. As James Hentor said: 'Life is the sum total of the forces that resist death. Evil assaults me where resistance is weak—in the joints of my spiritual armour.'

"Youth has these weak places. The joints in his armour are: First, Lack of will and lack of individuality. Youth bites often at the bare hook. Is not careful in the choice of companions is another weakness. Second, A love of pleasure. Excess in pleasure is wearesome. Excess offered a reward for the invention of a new pleasure. Third. Conceit is another weakness. A little success is apt to render youth top heavy—wiser than seven grown up men who can render a reason. The Earl of Buchan's manuscript was refused because the compositor did not have capital I's sufficient to set it up. Fourth, Rashness is another joint in the armour. He relies upon his feelings to guide him rather than his judgment.

"Youth needs to guard himself aginst these vulnerable joints in his armour. God will grant him protection. Lavater, the physiognomist, analyzed the face of Socrates and found there the lines of baseness. In his eye he saw deceit, but with it all he saw clearly marked upon that countenance prodigious self-government. You have a shield of faith in God for the weak spots in your armour. Youth is the time for faith. Joel says: Your young men shall see visions; your old men shall dream dreams. It is better to see visions—indicates a clearer revelation; old men become Christians with difficulty. Youth is tender to receive impressions. Faith in God thus is the shield to protect you and no weapon then that is formed against thee shall do thee harm."

JUNIORS FAIR A SUCCESS.

The Event Closed After a Run of a Week.

The J. O. U. A. M. fair closed Saturday evening after a very successful run of one week. The attendance throughout the week has been good, and most everything was disposed of. Perhaps the greatest interest has been manifested in the bowling contests. As was stated, Charles E. Vail won the turkey Thanksgiving eve. with a score of 216, and after an enthusiastic contest J. C. Young captured the silk umbrella with the highest score for the week, which was 221. The alleys were crowded Saturday evening with bowlers who were anxious to beat the score but no one was so fortunate.

A feature of the fair was the dancing, music for which was furnished by LaVere's orchestra.

The women, whose names have been mentioned in The Daily Press, deserve great praise for their efforts to make the fair a success. Miss Hartpence won the ring contest, she having collected nearly $15

The object of the fair was to secure money to purchase new suits for the initiatory team and the members will no doubt realize a goodly sum for their work in holding the fair.

MOUNTAIN CAMP RANSACKED.

Unknown Visitors Break Into Dr. Lewis' Summer Home.

Those who were able to visit Rev. Dr. A. H. Lewis' summer camp near Washington Rock during the Lutheran Synod found the place a very delightful one. A party of hunters who recently visited the neighborhood found that there are others of the same opinion. The house, for there is one, has recently been broken into by someone and the place thoroughly ransacked. The visitation had evidently occurred only a few days ago. While there was nothing of value left in the camp by the campers when they departed it is feared that some stray 'knights of the road' had made the camp their rendezvous and have been making themselves unpleasantly at home. An investigating party will soon visit the camp and close it up for the winter.

SOCIAL SIDE OF A CHURCH

HOPE CHAPEL MEMBERS PASS A PLEASANT EVENING

Temperance Was the Subject Discussed and Many a Good Word of Advice Was Given in This, the Right Direction.

An excellent temperance meeting was held in Hope chapel, Monday evening, under the auspices of the Men's Mutual Improvement Society, the programme being arranged and carried out by the temperance committee.

Addresses were delivered by Rev. W. R Richards, of the Crescent Avenue Church, and Rev. G. K. Newell, pastor of the chapel. These addresses were listened to with marked attention and to all appearances made a deep impression upon all present. Appropriate songs and recitations were rendered by Geo. Belcher, Geo. Leighs, Edward Young and others.

W. G. Gray, president of the association made a short address urging all, especially the mothers and wives, to make the homes pleasant and happy, so as to counteract the influence of the saloon, at the same time urging upon the young men to take advantage of all the opportunities offered by the chapel and its auxiliaries for their own protection and culture.

At the close of the meeting a general introduction took place when all present were made acquainted with one another. An invitation was given to inspect the rooms sets apart and now organized for the use of the social committee. These rooms are to be exclusively used each week day evening for the purpose of study and simple parlor games. Already the reading room has been supplied with a number of valuable books and magazines well worthy the perusal of all.

We are glad to note that both old and young are taking advantage and using their spare time to good purpose.

THEATRICAL.

Of James A. Herne's play of New England life character, "Shore Acres," an eminent Chicago clergyman said: "The moonlight streaming through the frosted windows of the old homestead redeemed in every sense God's benediction." In the same city "Shore Acres" was honored with a clergymen's theatre party, the first one ever formed in America. The following Sunday the play formed the subject of a number of sermons and it was highly praised for its strength and purity. Mr. Herne has gained a fortune with this beautiful homely drama, which is promised a fine production at Music Hall, Monday evening, Dec 7. The company engaged to appear in "Shore Acres" contains many players of ability, among them being Messrs. George W. Wilson and Atkins Lawrence. Entire new scenery and some mechanical efforts will be employed.

Visited the City Farm.

By invitation of Mr. Frost, Drs. Marsh and Herold and Wm. T. Hunt, comprising the Passaic Valley sewerage commissioners, appointed to devise means to abate the pollution of the Passaic River, visited the Plainfield city farm and disposal beds yesterday, and made a careful study of the construction and working of the system here to aid them in the solution of the difficult problem they have undertaken.

Dined After a Hunt.

Wm. L. Smalley, Jr., of Somerset street, entertained a few friends at dinner last evening, after their hunting trip over the mountains. Those who partook of the host's hospitality were: Wm. Cadmus and Arthur Loring, of Brooklyn; Judge DeMeza, Robert Crosson, Harry McDonald and Jedediah M. Smalley, of Plainfield.

The old lady was right when she said the child might die if they waited for the doctor. She saved the little one's life with a few doses of One Minute Cough Cure. She had used it for croup before. L. W. Randolph, 143 West Front street.

America. He wants to interest him and it seems almost impossible to interest William in anything. He doesn't like America. I think it's the beer."

"I didn't like their beer myself," admitted Kenyon.

"Well, I shall arrange a meeting between you and William, and then you can talk it over. I know father would be pleased if he became interested in forming a mining company, or in anything, in fact."

After Edith Longworth left him, Kenyon waited where he was for some time hoping Wentworth would come along, so that he might tell him of their possible new partner; but the young man did not appear. At last Kenyon rose and began to search for him. He passed along the deck, but found no trace of his friend. He looked for a moment into the smoking-room, but Wentworth was not there. He went downstairs to the saloon, but his search below was equally fruitless. Coming up on deck again he saw Miss Brewster sitting alone reading a paper-covered novel.

"Have you seen my friend Wentworth?" he asked the young woman.

She laid the book, open-faced, upon her lap, and looked quickly up at Kenyon before answering:

"I saw him not very long ago, but I don't know where he is now. Perhaps you will find him in his stateroom; in fact, I think it more than likely he is there." With that Miss Brewster resumed her reading.

Kenyon descended to the state-room and opened the door. Wentworth sat upon the plush-covered sofa, with his head in his hands. At the opening of the door he started and looked for a moment at his friend, apparently not seeing him. His face was so gray and ghastly that Kenyon placed his hand against the wall for support as he saw it.

"My God! George," he cried. "What's the matter with you? What has happened? Tell me."

Wentworth gazed in front of him with glassy eyes for a moment, but did not answer. Then his head dropped again in his hands, and he groaned aloud.

CHAPTER VI.

"Tell me what has happened," repeated John Kenyon.

Wentworth looked up at him. "Everything has happened," he answered.

"What do you mean, George? Are you ill? What is the matter with you?"

"I am worse than ill, John; a great deal worse than ill. I wish I were ill."

"That wouldn't help things, whatever is wrong. Come, wake up. Tell me what the trouble is."

"John, I am a fool—an ass—a gibbering idiot."

"Admitting that—what then?"

"I trusted a woman—imbecile that I am; and now—now—I'm what you see me."

"Has—has Miss Brewster anything to do with it?" asked Kenyon, suspiciously.

"She has everything to do with it."

"Has she—rejected you, George?"

"What! that girl? Oh, you're the idiot now. Do you think I would ask her?"

"I cannot be blamed for jumping at conclusions. You must remember that girl," as you call her, has had most of your company during this voyage; and most of your good words when you were moist with her. What is the matter? What has she to do with your trouble?"

Wentworth paced up and down the narrow limits of the state-room as if he were caged. He smote his hand against his thigh, while Kenyon looked at him in wonder.

"I don't know how I can tell you, John," he said. "I must, of course; but I don't know how I can."

"Come on deck with me."

"Never."

"Come out, I say, into the fresh air. It is stuffy here, and, besides, there is more danger of being overheard in the stateroom than on deck. Come along, old fellow." He caught his companion by the arm, and partly dragged him out of the room, closing the door behind him.

"Pull yourself together," he said. "A little fresh air will do you good."

They made their way to the deck, and linking arms walked up and down. For a long time Wentworth said nothing, and Kenyon had the tact to hold his peace. Suddenly Wentworth noticed that they were pacing back and forth in front of Miss Brewster, so he continued his walk around to the other side of the ship. After a few turns up and down, he said: "You remember Rivers, of course?"

"Certainly."

"He was employed on that vile sheet, the New York Argus."

"I suppose it is a vile sheet. I don't subscribe for it or even see it. Yes, I know he was connected with that paper. What then? What has Miss Brewster to do with Rivers?"

"She is one of the Argus staff, too."

"George Wentworth, you don't mean to tell me that!"

"I do."

"Heavens! This is fearful. Is there no way you would try to prevent her sending it?"

"If you think you can prevent her I wish you would try it."

"How did you find it out? Did she tell you?"

"Oh, it doesn't matter how I found it out. I did find it out. A man told me who she was; then I asked her, and she was perfectly frank about it. She read me the report even."

"Read it to you?"

"Yes, read it to me, and punctuated it in my presence—put in some words that I suggested as being better than those she had used. Oh, it was the coolest piece of work you ever saw."

"But there must be some way of preventing—getting that account to New York in time. You see, all we have to do is to wire your people to hand in our report to the directors, and then her report is forestalled. She has to telegraph from a British office, and it seems to me that we could stop her in some way."

"As for instance, how?"

"Oh, I don't know just how at the moment, but we ought to be able to do it. If it was a man we could have him arrested on some financial sheet-ing; but a woman, of course, is more difficult to deal with. George, I would appeal to her better nature if I were you."

Wentworth laughed sneeringly. "Better nature?" he said. "She hasn't any; and that is not the worst of it. She has 'calculated,' as she calls it, all the possibilities in the affair; she 'calculates' that we will reach Queenstown about Saturday night. If we do, she will get her report through in time to be published on Sunday in the New York Argus. If that is the case, then we where our telegram will be. We telegraph our people to send in the report. It reaches the office Saturday night, and is not read. The office closes at two o'clock; but even if they got it, and understood the urgency of the matter, they could not place the papers before the directors until Monday morning, and by Monday morning it will be old financial sheets."

"George, that woman is a fiend."

"No, she isn't, John. She is merely a clever American journalist, who thinks she has done a very clever good piece of work indeed, and who, through the stupidity of one man, has succeeded, that's all."

"Have you made any appeal to her at all?"

"Oh, haven't I? Of course I have. What good did it do? She merely laughed at me. Don't you understand? That is what she is here for. Her whole voyage is for that one purpose; and it's not likely the woman is going to forego her triumph after having succeeded—especially as somebody else in the same office has failed. That's what gives additional zest to what she has done. The fact that Rivers has failed and she has succeeded, seems to be the great feather in her cap."

"Then," said Kenyon, "I am going to appeal to Miss Brewster myself."

"Very well. I wish you joy of your job. Do what you can, John, there's a good fellow. Meanwhile I want to be alone somewhere."

Wentworth went down the stairway that led to the steerage department, and for a few moments sat among the steerage passengers. Then he climbed up another ladder, and got to the very front of the ship. Here he sat down on a coil of rope and thought over the situation. Thinking, however, did him very little good. He realized that even if he got hold of the paper Miss Brewster had, she could easily write out another. She had the facts in her head, and all she needed to do was to get to a telegraph office, and there write out her message.

Meanwhile Kenyon took a few turns up and down the deck thinking deeply on the same subject. He passed over to the side where Miss Brewster sat, but on coming opposite her had not the courage to take his place beside her. She was calmly reading her book. Three times he came opposite her, paused for a moment, and then continued his hopeless march. He saw that his courage was not going to be sufficient for the task, and yet felt the task must be accomplished. He didn't know how to begin. He didn't know what inducement to offer the young woman for foregoing the fruits of her ingenuity. He felt that this was the weak point in his armor. The third time he paused in front of Miss Brewster, she looked up and motioned him to the chair beside her, saying:

"And is she here to find out about the mine?"

"Exactly. She was put on the job after Rivers had failed."

"George!" said Kenyon, suddenly dropping his companion's arm, and facing him. "What have you told her?"

"There is the misery of it. I have told her everything."

"My dear fellow, how could you be—"

"Oh, I know—I know. I know everything you would say. Everything you can say I have said to myself, and ten times more and ten times worse. There is nothing you can say of me more bitter than what I think about myself."

"Did you tell her anything about my report?"

"I told her everything, everything! Do you understand? She is going to telegraph from Queenstown the full essence of our reports—of both our reports."

"I don't know you very well, Mr. Kenyon, but I know who you are. Won't you sit down beside me for a few moments?" The bewildered man sat down on the chair she indicated.

"Now, Mr. Kenyon, I know just what is troubling you. You have passed three or four times wishing to sit down beside me and yet afraid to venture. Is that not true?"

"Quite true."

"I knew it was. Now I know also what you have come for. Mr. Wentworth has told you what the trouble is. He has told you that he has given me all the particulars about the mines, hasn't he?"

"He has."

"And he has gone off to his state room to think over the matter, and has left the affair in your hands, and you imagine that you have come to me, and, perhaps, talk me out of sending that dispatch to the Argus. Isn't that your motive?"

"That is about what I hope to be able to do," said Kenyon, mopping his brow.

"Well, I thought that might just as well put you out of your misery at once. You take things very seriously, Mr. Kenyon. I can see that. Now, don't you?"

"I'm afraid I do."

"Why, of course you do. The publication of this, as I told Mr. Wentworth, will really not matter at all. It will not be any reflection on either of you, because your friends will be sure that if you had known to whom you were talking, you would never have said anything about the mines."

Kenyon smiled grimly at this piece of comfort.

"Now, I have been thinking about something since Mr. Wentworth went away. I am really very sorry for him. I am more sorry than I can tell."

"Then," said John, "won't you—"

"No, I won't, so we needn't recur to that phase of the subject. That is what I am here for, and, no matter what you say, the dispatch is going to be sent. Now, it is better to understand that at first, and then it will create no trouble afterwards. Don't you think that is the best?"

"Probably," answered the wretched man.

"Well, then, let us start there. I will say in the cablegram that the information comes from neither Mr. Kenyon nor Mr. Wentworth."

"Yes, but that wouldn't be true."

"Why, of course it wouldn't be true, but that doesn't matter, does it?"

"Well, on our side of the water," said Kenyon, "we think that the truth does matter."

Miss Brewster laughed heartily. "Dear me," she said, "what little tact you have. How does it concern you whether it is true or not? If there is any falsehood it is not going to you. It is you are free from all blame. Indeed you are free from all blame, anyhow, in this affair; it is all your friend Wentworth's fault; but still, if it hasn't been Wentworth, it would have been you."

Kenyon looked up at her incredulously.

"Oh yes, it would," she said, nodding confidently at him. "You must not flatter yourself because Mr. Wentworth told me everything about it, that you wouldn't have done just the same, if I had to find it out from you. All men are pretty much alike where women are concerned."

"Can I say nothing to you, Miss Brewster, which will keep you from sending the message to America?"

"No, you cannot. I thought we had settled that at the beginning. I see there is no use talking to you. I will return to my book, which is very interesting. Good morning, Mr. Kenyon."

Kenyon felt the hopelessness of his project quite as much as Wentworth had done, and, thrusting his hands deep into his pockets, he wandered disconsolately up and down the deck.

As he went to the other side of the deck he met Miss Longworth walking alone. She smiled a cordial welcome to him, so he turned and changed his step to walk by her.

"May I walk with you a few minutes?" he said.

"Certainly," was the reply. "What is the matter? You are looking very unhappy."

"My comrade and myself are in great trouble, and I thought I would like to talk with you about it."

"I am sure if there is anything I can do to help you I shall be most glad to do it."

"Perhaps you may suggest something. You see two men dealing with one woman are perfectly helpless."

"Ah, who is the one woman—not I, is it?"

"No, not you, Miss Longworth. I wish it were, then we would have no trouble."

"Oh, thank you."

"You see it is like this: When we were in Quebec—I think I told you about that—the New York Argus sent a man to find out what we had reported, or were going to report, to the London syndicate."

"Yes, you told me that."

"Rivers was his name. Well, this same paper, finding that Rivers had failed, after having stolen the documents, has tried a much more subtle scheme, which promises to be much more successful. They have put on board this ship a young woman, who has gained a reputation for learning secrets not intended for the public. This young woman is Miss Brewster, who sits next to Wentworth at the table. Fate seems to have played right into her hand and placed her beside him. They became acquainted, and, unfortunately, poor friend has told her a great deal about the mines, which she seemed to have an interest in. Or, rather, she pretended to have an interest in him, and so he spoke, being, of course, off his guard. There is no more cold-blooded fellow in the world than George Wentworth, but a man does not expect that a private conversation with a lady will ever appear in a newspaper."

"Naturally not."

"Very well, that is the state of things. In some manner Wentworth came to know that this young woman was the special correspondent of the New York Argus. He spoke to her about it, and she is perfectly frank in saying she is here solely for the purpose of finding out what the reports will be, and that the moment she gets to Queenstown she will cable what she has discovered to New York.

"Dear me, that is very perplexing. What have you done?"

"We have done nothing, so far; or, rather, I should say, we have done everything we could think of, and have accomplished nothing. Went worth has appealed to her, and I made a personal appeal to her, but it was of no use. I feel my own helplessness in this matter, and Went worth is completely broken down over it."

They walked up and down the deck in silence for two or three turns. Then Miss Longwood looked up at Kenyon and said:

"Will you place this matter in my hands?"

"Certainly; if you will be so kind as to take any interest in it."

"I take a great deal of interest. Of course, you know my father is deeply concerned in it, also, so I am acting in a measure for him."

"Have you any plan?"

"Yes; my plan is simply this: The young woman is working for money; now, if we can offer her more than her paper gives, she will very quickly accept, or I am much mistaken in the kind of woman she is."

"Ah, yes," said Kenyon, "but we haven't the money, you see."

"Never mind; the money will be quickly forthcoming. Don't trouble any more about it. I am sure that can be arranged."

Kenyon thanked her, looking his gratitude rather than speaking it, for he was an unsteady man, and she bade him good-by until she could think over her plan.

That evening there was a tap at the stateroom door of Miss Jennie Brewster.

"Come in!" cried the young woman.

Miss Longworth entered, and the occupant of the room looked up with a frown from her writing.

"May I have a few moments' conversation with you?" asked Miss Longworth.

CHAPTER VII.

Miss Jennie Brewster was very much annoyed at being interrupted, and she took no pains to conceal her feelings. She was writing an article entitled "How People Kill Time on Shipboard," and she did not wish to be disturbed; besides, as she often said of herself, she was not a "woman's woman," and neither liked nor was liked by her own sex.

"I desire a few moments' conversation with you, if I have your permission," said Edith Longworth, as she closed the door behind her.

"Certainly," answered Jennie Brewster. "Will you sit down?"

"Thank you," replied the other, as she took a seat on the sofa. "I do not know just how to begin what I wish to say. Perhaps it will be better to commence by telling you that I know why you are on board this steamer."

"Yes; and why am I on board the steamer, may I ask?"

"You are here, I understand, to get certain information from Mr. Wentworth. You have obtained it, and it is in reference to this that I have come to see you."

"Indeed! And are you so friendly with Mr. Wentworth that you—"

"I scarcely know Mr. Wentworth at all."

"Then why do you come on a mission from him?"

"It is not on a mission from him. It is not a mission from anyone. I was speaking to Mr. Kenyon, or rather, Mr. Kenyon was speaking to me about a subject which troubled him greatly. It is a subject in which my father is interested. My father is a member of the London syndicate, and he naturally would not desire to have your intended cable message sent to New York."

"Really; are you quite sure that you are not speaking less for your father than for your friend Kenyon?"

Anger burned in Miss Longworth's face, and flashed from her eyes as she answered:

"You must not speak to me in that way."

"Excuse me, I shall speak to you in just the way I please. I did not ask for this conference, you did, and as you have taken it upon yourself to come into this room uninvited, you will have to put up with what you hear. Those who interfere with other people's business, as a general thing, do not have a nice time."

"I quite appreciated all the possible disagreeableness of coming here when I came."

"I am glad of that, because if you hear anything you do not like, you will not be disappointed, and will have only yours if to thank for it."

"I would like to talk about this matter in a spirit of friendliness, if I can. I think it can be attained by speaking in any other way."

"Very well, then. What excuse have you to give me for coming to my stateroom to talk about business which does not concern you?"

"Miss Brewster, it does concern me—it concerns my father, and that concerns me. I am, in a measure, my father's private secretary, and am intimately acquainted with all the business he has in hand. This particular business is his affair, and therefore mine. That is the reason I am here."

"Are you sure?"

"Am I sure of what?"

"Are you sure that what you say is true?"

"I am not in the habit of speaking anything but the truth."

"Perhaps you flatter yourself in that case, but it does not deceive me. You merely come here because Mr. Kenyon is in a muddle about what I am going to do. Isn't that the reason?"

Miss Longworth saw that her task was going to be even harder than she had expected.

"Suppose we let all question of motive rest? I have come here—I have every right to come—to speak on a subject, and you have given me the permission. Having done so, it seems to me you should hear me out. You say that I should not be offended—"

"I didn't say so. I do not care a rap whether I am offended or not."

"You at least said I might hear something that would not be pleasant. What I wanted to say is this: I have taken the risk of that, and, as you remark, whether I am offended or not does not matter. Now we will come to the point—"

"Just before you come to the point, please let me know if Mr. Kenyon told you he had spoken to me on this subject already?"

"Yes, he told me so."

"Did he tell you that his friend Wentworth had also had a conversation with me about it?"

"Yes, he told me that also."

"Very well, then, if those two men can do nothing to assist my purpose, how do you expect to do it?"

"That is what I am about to tell you. This is a commercial world, and I am a commercial man's daughter. I recognize the fact that you are going to cable this information for the money it brings. Is not that the case?"

"It is partly the case."

"For what other consideration do you work, then?"

"For the consideration of being known as one of the best newspaper women in the city of New York. That is the other consideration."

"I understood you were already known as the most noted newspaper woman in New York."

"This conversation is much more diplomatic than Miss Longworth herself suspected.

Jennie Brewster looked rather pleased, then she said:

"Oh, I don't know about that, but I intend it shall be so before a year is past."

"Very well, you have plenty of time to accomplish your object without using the information you have obtained on board this ship. Now, as I was saying, the New York Argus pays you a certain amount for doing this work. If you will promise not to send the report over to that paper, I will give you a check for double the sum the Argus will pay you, besides refunding all your expenses twice over."

"In other words, you ask me to be bribed and refuse to perform my duty to the paper?"

"It isn't bribery. I merely pay you, or will pay you, double what you will receive from that paper. I presume your connection with the paper is purely commercial. You work for it because you receive a certain amount of money; if the editor found some one who would do the same work cheaper, he would employ that person, and your services would be no longer required. Is that not true?"

"Yes, it is true."

"Very well, then, the question of duty hardly comes into such a compact. They have sent you on what would be to most people a very difficult mission. You have succeeded. You have, therefore, in your possession something to sell. The New York paper will pay you a certain sum in order to get it. I offer you, for the same article, double the price the New York Argus will pay you. Is that not a fair offer?"

Jennie Brewster had arisen. She clasped and unclasped her hands nervously. For a small space of time nothing was said, and Edith Longworth imagined she had gained her point. The woman standing looked down at the woman sitting.

"Do you know all the particulars about the attempt to get this information?" asked Miss Brewster.

"I know some of them. What particulars do you mean?"

"Do you know that a man from the Argus tried to get this information from Mr. Kenyon and Mr. Wentworth in Canada?"

"Yes; I know about that."

"Do you know that he stole the papers, and that they were taken from him before he could use them?"

"Yes."

"Do you know he offered Mr. Kenyon and Mr. Wentwort double the price the London syndicate would have paid them, on condition they gave him a synopsis of the reports?"

"Yes, I know that also."

"Very well, then. Now you ask me to do very much the same thing Rivers asked them: because you ask me to keep my paper completely in the dark about the information I have got, isn't that so?"

"Yes, you can keep them in the dark until after the report has been given to the directors; then, of course, you can do what you please with the information."

"Ah, by that time it will be of no value. By that time it will be published in the London financial papers. At that time everybody can get it. Isn't that the case?"

"I suppose so."

"Now, I want to ask you one other question, Miss—Miss—I don't think you told me your name."

"My name is Edith Longworth."

"Very well, Miss Longworth. I want to ask you one more question. When do you think of the conduct of Mr. Rivers, in offering Wentworth his reward to take double what I have promised for making the report?"

"What do I think of them?" repeated the girl.

"Yes, what do you think of them? You hesitate. You evade the question in a corner. You think Mr. Wentworth and Mr. Kenyon did very nobly in refusing Rivers' offer?"

"Certainly I do."

"So do I. I think they acted rightly, and I did not expect honorable men should do. Now, when you think that, Miss Longworth, how dare you come and offer me double, or three times, or four times, the amount my paper gives to me for getting this information? Do you think that I am any less honorable than Kenyon and Wentworth? Your offer is an insult to me—nobody but a woman, and a woman of your class, would have made it. You come here to bribe me. You come here to do exactly the same thing that Mr. Rivers attempted to do for the Argus in Canada. You think money will purchase anything, that is the thought of your class. Now, I want you to understand that I am a woman of the people. I was born and brought up in poverty in New York. You were born and brought up, amid luxury, in London. I have suffered privations and hardships that you know nothing of, and even if you read about them, you wouldn't understand. Yet, with the impulses of your class, think you can come to me and bribe me to betray my employer. I am here to do a certain thing, and I am going to do that certain thing in spite of all the money that all the Longworths ever possessed, or ever will possess. Do I make myself sufficiently plain?"

"Certainly, Miss Brewster. I don't think anyone could misunderstand you."

"Well, I am glad of that, because one can never tell how thickheaded some people may be."

"Do you think there is any parallel between your case and Mr. Wentworth's?"

"Of course I do. We are each sent to do a certain piece of work. We have both been offered a bribe to cheat our employers of the fruits of our labor; only in my case it is much more than in Wentworth's, because the employer he would not have suffered, while mine will."

"This is all very plausible, Miss Brewster, but now allow me to tell you that what you have done is a most dishonorable thing, and that you are a disgrace to your common womanhood. You have managed, during a very short acquaintance, to win the confidence of a man there is a class of woman who know how to do that—I thank Heaven I am not of that class; I prefer to belong to the class you have just now been reviling. Some men have an inherent respect for all women; Mr. Wentworth is apparently one of those, and, while he was on his guard with a man, he was not on his guard with a woman. You took advantage of that, and you managed to secure certain information which you knew he would never have given you if he had thought it was to be published. You stole that information just as regularly as though you stole the despatches from Mr. Kenyon's pocket. You talk of your honor and your truth when you did such a contemptible thing. You prate of unbribeableness, when the only method possible is adopted of managing you do what is right and just and honorable. Your conduct makes me ashamed of being a woman. A thoughtful woman I can understand, but not a woman like you, who trades on the fact that you are a woman, and that you are pretty, and that you have a pleasing manner. You use those qualities as a thief or a counterfeiter would use the peculiar talents God had given him. How dare you pretend for a moment that your profession is similar to Mr. Wentworth's? Mr. Wentworth is an honorable man, engaged in an honorable business; as for you and your business, I have no words to express my contempt for both. Picking pockets is respectable compared with such work."

Edith Longworth was now standing up, her face flushed and her hands clenched. She spoke with a vehemence which she very much regretted when she thought of the contrast afterwards; but the change in and disappointment at failure, where she had a moment before been sure of success, overcame her. Her opponent stood before her, angry and pale. At first Edith Longworth thought she was going to strike her, but if any such idea passed through the brain of the newspaper woman she thought better of it. For a few moments neither spoke, then Jennie Brewster said, in a voice of unnatural calmness:

"You are quite welcome to your opinion of me, Miss Longworth, and I presume I am entitled to my opinion of Kenyon and Wentworth. They are two souls, and you are a third in thinking you can control the actions of a woman where two young men have failed. Do you think for a moment I would grant you a woman of a class I hate, what I would not grant to a young man like Wentworth? They say there is no fool like an old fool, but it should be said that there is no fool like a young woman who has had everything her own way in this world. You are—"

"I will not stay and listen to your abuse. I wish to have nothing more to do with you."

"Oh, yes, you will stay!" cried the other, placing her back against the door. "You came here at your own pleasure; you will leave at mine. I will tell you more truth in five minutes than you ever heard in your life before. I will tell you, in the first place, that my business is quite as honorable as Kenyon's or Wentworth's. What does Kenyon do but try to get information about affairs which other people are vitally interested in keeping from him? What does Wentworth do but ferret about among accountants like a detective, trying to find out what other people are developing? What is the whole mining business but one vast swindle, whose worst enemy is the press? No wonder anyone connected with mining fears publicity. If your father has not made his millions he has made it simply by swindling unfortunate victims. I do my business my way, and your two friends do theirs in their way. Of the two, I consider my vocation much the more honorable, for the reason that I am not afraid what I have to say, you may go, and let me tell you that I never wish to see you or speak with you again."

"Thank you for your permission to go. I am sure I cordially echo your wish that we may never meet again. I may say, however, that I am sorry I spoke to you in the way I did. It is, of course, impossible for you to look upon the matter from my point of view, just as it is impossible for me to look upon it from yours. Nevertheless, I wish you would forget what I said, and think over the matter a little more, and if you see your way to accepting my offer I will always be open to you. If you will forego the sending of that cablegram I will willingly pay you three times what the New York Argus will give you for it. I do not offer that as a bribe; I merely offer it so that you will see further from the point I believe to be a just action. It seems to me a great pity that two young men should have to endure a serious check in their business advancement because of a few words that were brought to consist in a woman in whom he believed."

Edith Longworth was young, and, of course, could not be expected to be a mistress of diplomacy, but she might have known that that sentence she uttered spoiled the effect of all that had gone before.

"Really, Miss Longworth, I had some little admiration for you when you stood out at me in the way you did; but now, you have given away your offer of a bribe, adding one-third to it, all respect for you vanishes. You may go and tell those who sent you that nothing under Heaven can prevent that cablegram being sent."

In saying this, however, Miss Brewster somewhat exceeded her knowledge. Few of us can foretell what may or may not happen under Heaven.

CHAPTER VIII.

Edith Longworth went to her state room and there had what women call a good cry over her failure. Jennie Brewster continued her writing, every now and then pausing as she thought, with regret, of something she might have said, which did not occur to her at the time of the interview. Kenyon spent his time in pacing up and down the deck, hoping for the reappearance of Miss Longworth, an expectation which, for a time, at least, was the hope deferred which maketh the heart sick. Fleming, the New York politician, kept the smoking-room merry by listening to the stories he told. He varied the proceedings by frequently asking everyone to drink with him, an invitation that met with no general refusal. Old Mr. Longworth dozed most of his time in his steamer chair. Wentworth, who still bitterly accused himself of having been a fool, talked with no one, not even his friend Kenyon. All the time the great steamer kept forging along through the reasonably calm water just as if nothing had happened or was going to happen. There had been one night of storm and part of a day of storm. Saturday morning broke, and it was expected that some time in the night Queenstown would be reached. Early on Saturday morning the clouds looked lowering, as they have a right to look most in Ireland.

Wentworth, the cause of all the worry, gave Kenyon very little assistance in the matter that troubled his mind. He was in the habit, when the subject was referred to, of thrusting his hands into his hair, or plunging them down into his pockets, and breaking out into language which was as deplorable as it was expressive. The more Kenyon advised him to calm, the less Wentworth followed his advice. As a general thing, he spent most of his time alone in a very gloomy state of mind. On one occasion, when the genial Fleming slapped him on the shoulder, Wentworth, to his great astonishment, turned fiercely round and cried:

"If you do that again, sir, I'll knock you down."

Fleming said afterwards that he was "completely flabbergasted" by this, whatever that may mean, and he added that the English in general were a queer race.

It is true that he gathered himself together at the time, and, having laughed a little over the remark, said to Wentworth:

"And had what women call a good cry."

"Come and have a drink; then you'll feel better."

This invitation Wentworth did not even take the trouble to decline, but thrust his hands in his pockets once more, and turned his back on the popular New York politician.

Wentworth summed up the whole matter to John Kenyon when he said: "There is no use in our talking or thinking any more about it. We can simply do nothing. I shall take the whole blame on my shoulders. I am resolved that you shall not suffer from my indiscretion. Now, don't talk to me any more about it. I want to forget the wretched business, if possible." So, thus it came about quite naturally that John Kenyon, who was a good deal troubled about the matter, took as his confidante Edith Longworth, who also betrayed the greatest interest in the problem. Miss Longworth was left all the more alone because her cousin had taken permanently to the smoking-room, where no one had introduced him to the fascinating game of poker, and in the practice of this peculiar amusement Mr. William Longworth was now spending a good deal of his surplus cash as well as his time.

Jennie Brewster was seldom seen on deck. She applied herself assiduously to the writing of that brilliant series of articles which have since appeared in the Sunday edition of the New York Argus under the general title of "Life at Sea," and which were recently issued in book form.

As everybody is already aware, her sketches of the genial New York politicians and also of the taciturn Englishmen she encountered on the finest things in the little volume. They have been largely copied as typical examples of American humor. When Jennie Brewster did appear on deck, she walked about in a dreamy, unconscious kind of half-defiant look in her eye as she passed Kenyon or Miss Longworth, and she generally passed them together.

On this particularly eventful Saturday morning Kenyon and Miss Longworth had the deck to themselves. The conversation naturally turned to the subject which had occupied the minds of both for the few last days.

"Do you know," said Miss Longworth, "I have been thinking all along that she would come to me at the last for the money."

"I am not at all sure about that," answered Kenyon.

"I thought she would probably keep us on the tenter-hooks just as long as possible, and then at the last moment come and say she would accept the offer."

"If she does," said Kenyon, "I would not trust her. I would give her to understand that a check would be handed to her when we were certain the article had not been used."

"Do you think that would be the safe way to act if she came and said she would take the money for not sending the cablegram? Don't you think it would be better to pay her and trust to her honor?"

Kenyon laughed somewhat sarcastically. "I do not think I would trust much to her honor."

"Now, do you know, I have a different opinion of her. I feel sure that if she said she would do a thing, she would do it."

"I have no such faith," answered Kenyon. "I think, on the contrary, that she is quite capable of such an action as asking you for the money and still sending her telegram."

"Well, I doubt if she would do so. I think the girl really believes she is acting rightly, and imagines she has done a very creditable action in a very clever way. If she were not what she calls 'honest,' she would not have shown as much temper as she did—not but that I gave a deplorable exhibition of temper myself, for which there was really no excuse."

"I am sure," said Kenyon, warmly, "you did nothing of the kind. At all events, I am certain everything you did was perfectly right; and I know you were completely justified in anything you said."

"I wish I could think so."

"I want to ask you one question," said Kenyon. But what that question was will never be known. It was never asked; and when Edith Longworth inquired about it, some time later, the question had entirely gone from Kenyon's mind. The steamship, which was now going along through the waters, suddenly gave a shiver, as if it were shaken by an earthquake; there were three tremendous bumps, such as a sled might make by going suddenly over logs concealed in the snow. Both Kenyon and Miss Longworth sprang to their feet. There was a low roar of steam, and they saw a cloud rise up amidships, apparently pouring out of every aperture through which it could escape.

"What—what is it?" she cried in alarm.

There was silence. The engines stopped dead, and the vessel heeled distinctly over to the port side. When Miss Longworth began to realize the situation, she found herself very close to Kenyon, clasping his arm with both hands.

"What—what is it!" she cried, in alarm.

"Something is wrong," said Kenyon. "Nothing serious, I hope. Will you wait here a moment while I go and see?"

"Certainly," she answered, releasing his arm. "It is stupid of me, but I feel very much frightened."

"Perhaps you would rather not be left alone?"

"Oh, no, it is all over now; but when the first of those terrible shocks came it seemed to me we had struck a rock."

"There are no rocks here," said Kenyon. "The day is perfectly clear, and we are evidently not out of our course. Something has gone wrong with the machinery, I imagine. Just wait a moment, and I will find out." As Kenyon rushed toward the companionway he met a sailor, hurrying in the other direction.

"What is the matter?" cried Kenyon.

The sailor gave no answer.

On entering the companionway door, Kenyon found the place full of steam, and he ran against the officer.

"What is wrong? Is anything the matter?"

"How should I know?" was the answer, very curtly given. "Please do not ask any questions. Everything will be attended to."

This was scant encouragement. People began crowding up the companionway, coughing and wheezing in the steam; and soon the deck, that a moment before had been almost without an occupant, was crowded with excited human beings in all states of dress and undress.

"What is wrong?" was the question on every lip, to which, as yet, there was no answer. The officers who hurried to and fro were mute, or gave short and unsatisfactory replies to the inquiries which poured in upon them. People did not pause to reflect that even an officer could hardly be expected to know off-hand what was the cause of the sudden stoppage of the engine. By and by the captain appeared, smiling and bland. He told them there was no danger. Something had gone wrong with the machinery; exactly what he could not at the moment tell; but there was no necessity for being panic-stricken: everything would be all right in a short time if they would remained calm. These and a lot of other nautical lies which are always told on such occasions served to calm the fears of the crowd; and, by and by, one after another went down to their staterooms on finding the vessel was not going to sink immediately. They all appeared some time afterward in more suitable apparel. The steam which had filled the saloon soon disappeared, leaving the furniture dripping with warm moisture. Finally the loud clang of the breakfast gong sounded as if nothing had happened, and that did more, perhaps, than anything else to allay the fears of the passengers. If breakfast was about to be served, then, of course, things were not serious. Still, a great many people that morning had a very poor appetite for the breakfast served to them. The one blessing, as everybody said, was that the weather was so fine and the sea so calm. The majority of the passengers, however, did not notice it. After breakfast people came up on deck. There was a wonderful avoidance of hurry alike by officers and sailors. Orders were given calmly and quietly, and as calmly and quietly obeyed. Officers were still upon the bridge, although there were no commands to give to the man at the wheel and no screw turning. The human steel at the wheel as if he expected at any time the order to turn it port or starboard. All this absence of rush had a very calming effect on the passengers, many of whom showed only a slight excuse to become hysterical. As the day wore on, however, a general feeling of security seemed to have come upon all on board. Then one and all congratulated themselves on the fact that they had all behaved in a most exemplary manner considering the somewhat alarming circumstances. Nevertheless, those who watched the captain saw that he swept the long line of the horizon through his glass every now and then with a good deal of agitation, and they noticed on looking at the long level line where sea and sky met that not a sail was visible around the complete circle. Up from the engine-room came the clank of hammers, and the opinion was general that whatever was amiss with the engine was capable of being repaired. One thing had become certain, there was nothing wrong with the shafts. The damage, whatever it was, had been to the engine alone. All of the passengers found themselves more or less affected by the peculiar sensation of the steamer being at rest—the awe-inspiring and helpless consciousness of complete silence—after the steady throb they had become so accustomed to all the way across. That night at dinner the captain took his place at the head of the table, bland and smiling and polite as ever, just as if nothing had happened; and the people who, notwithstanding their outward calmness, were in a state of peculiar tension, noticed this with grateful feelings.

"What is the matter?" asked a passenger of the captain, "and what is the extent of the accident?"

The captain looked down at the long table.

"I am afraid," said he, "that if I went into technical details you would not understand them. There was a flaw in one of the rods, connected with the engine. That rod broke, and, in breaking, it damaged other parts of the machinery. Doubtless you heard the three thuds which, it gave before the engine was stopped. At present it is impossible to tell how long it will take to repair the damage. However, even if the accident were serious, we are right in the track of vessels, and there is no danger."

This was reassuring but those who lay awake that night heard the ominous sound of the pumps, and the swishing of water splashing down into the ocean.

CHAPTER IX.

Most of the passengers awoke next morning with a bewildering feeling of vague apprehension. The absence of all motion, and the unusual sense of intense silence, had a depressing effect. The engines had not yet started; that at least was evident. Kenyon was one of the first on deck. He noticed that the pumps were still working at their full speed, and that the steamer had still the ominous list to port. Happily the weather continued good, so far as the quietness of the sea was concerned. A slight drizzle of rain had set in, and the horizon was not many miles from the ship. There would not be much chance of sighting another liner while such weather continued.

Before Kenyon had been many minutes on deck Edith Longworth came up the companionway. She approached him with a smile on her face.

"Well," he said, "you, at least, do not seem to be suffering any anxiety because of our situation."

"Not at all," she replied, "I was not thinking of that at all, but about something else. Can you not guess what it is?"

"No," he answered, hesitatingly. "What is it?"

"Have you forgotten that this is Sunday morning?"

"Is it? Of course it is. So far as I am concerned, time seemed to stop when the engines broke down. But I do not understand how Sunday means any thing in particular."

"Don't you? Well, for a person who has been thinking for the last two or three days very earnestly on one particular subject, I am astonished at you. Sunday morning, and no land in sight! Reflect for a moment."

Kenyon's face brightened.

"Ah," he cried, "I see what you mean now. Miss Brewster's cabled message will not appear in this morning's New York Argus."

"Of course it will not; and don't you see, also, that when we do arrive you will have an equal chance in the race. If we get to Queenstown with your telegram to the London people will go as quickly as her cable dispatches to New York; thus you will be saved the humiliation of seeing the substance of your report in the London papers before the reporters see it themselves. It is not much, to be sure, but still it puts you on equal terms, while if we had got into Queenstown last night that would have been impossible."

Kenyon laughed.

"Well," he said, "for such a result the cause is rather tremendous, isn't it? It is something like burning down the house to roast the pig!"

Shortly after ten o'clock the atmosphere was improved in the distance a steamer, westward bound. It evidently belonged to one of the great ocean lines. The moment it was sighted there fluttered up in the masthead a was about to be signaled, and, of course, things were not serious. Still, a great many people that morning had a very poor appetite for the breakfast served to them. The one blessing, as everybody said, was that the weather was so fine and the sea so calm. The majority of the passengers, however, did not notice it. After breakfast people came up on deck. There was a wonderful avoidance of hurry alike by officers and sailors. As the day wore on, however, a general feeling of security seemed to have come upon all on board. Then one and all congratulated themselves on the fact that they had all behaved in a most exemplary manner considering the somewhat alarming circumstances. Nevertheless, those who watched the captain saw that he swept the long line of the horizon through his glass every now and then with a good deal of agitation, and they noticed on looking at the long level line where sea and sky met that not a sail was visible around the complete circle. Up from the engine-room came the clank of hammers, and the opinion was general that whatever was amiss with the engine was capable of being repaired. One thing had become certain, there was nothing wrong with the shafts. The damage, whatever it was, had been to the engine alone. All of the passengers found themselves more or less affected by the

THE PRAIRIE PEACH.

OR POLLY, THE BRAVE BLOOMER GIRL OF BUTTE.

A Thrilling Tale of Arizona Alfred, His Bonny Bride, a Punctured Tire and a Horde of Real Dime Novel Indians. After a Handful of Years.

CHAPTER I.

The rising sun was circulating its golden shafts, while the dew gemmed lilies lifted their silver chalices to the persuasive rephyr that drifted about in quest of the cocktail, mixed by the rosy fingers of the dawn.

"Ah, there!" The Prairie Peach looked up from the buckskin knickerbockers upon which—supplementary sent she was embroidering quaint conceits and awe inspired, her earnest own, returning from the chase upon his wheel, the faithful rubber tired steed that never flagged, flinched or funibled.

Having embraced the Prairie Peach in salutation without disarranging her back hair, the nervy Nimrod proceeded to clip a few real outlaw whiskers from above from the deer which he had slain in the fastnesses of the forest hard by.

CHAPTER II.

As suddenly as a matrimonial proposal came the extemporaneous exlphone ache of an army of old fashioned, ordinary iron tired bicycles with the big, high wheels in front, mounted by Indians.

Zip! Zip!

And a shower of bullets hurtled through the malarious air with the sharp, familiar rat-tat-tat of the dry goods clerk swiftly tearing off a yard of Irish linen.

The rebkha swept on with the fury of a prairie fire in a high wind, unprocured by insurance.

"To the bikes!" To the bikes!" shouted Arizona Alfred, for the wily knave knew he could not hold the cabin against fighting Hen and his howling horde of hand painted aborigines, yelling like so many Xale Sioudants.

"All is well!" shouted Arizona Alfred in a soupcline frenzy to his fair young bride. "The mortgage interest is paid and the insurance policy is in the hands of the mortgagee, who is secured against loss."

"Thank heavens," she exclaimed as they mounted their wheels and went skimming gracefully along like two women with 27 cents apiece heading for a bargain counter.

CHAPTER III.

Madly athwart the rim of the horizon came Setting Hen et al., in such reckless pursuit of Arizona Alfred that their war paints all crept down their faces and took like a flock of posters tangled up in a cyclone.

Zip! Bang!

Bang! Zip!

Before Arizona Alfred had time even to frame his last words an arrow went whistling through the air, and the left ear of her pet bik pants like the incarnadined shank had in the ambrosiata. m. Before he could regain his feet he was seized by a stalwart brave, and the yellow crimson cachet face fairly dripped with mellifluous joy.

Then, with nimble fingers and face overflowing with pulpy palate, they tied him to the stake in a hard knox and lighted their pipes.

CHAPTER IV.

Her heart surcharged with woe and a lamentation on her lips, the beautiful Prairie Peach, now more beautiful than ever in her frights, ceased to be the fashion plate of the domestic circle.

"I will save him!" she cried bravely, while gnashing knuckles and clinched teeth.

And putting all her strength into the effort she scorched along and never cared a continental whether her hat was on straight or not.

"The nearest settlement is not far," she wailed, "and I will go to the nearest one and see that I will also save Alfred. Alfred, the erstwhile croquet champion of Jerolemon street, Brooklyn. 'Tis a consummation devoutly to be wished for," she sighed, as because upon his sweet, young life there is not a cent of fire insurance."

CHAPTER V.

In less time than is consumed in procuring one's change in a large department store Arizona Alfred's wife soon came bowling along at the head of the excited throng, each of which was mounted upon a certain bicycle whose name we will not mention because it does not advertise in these columns.

Soon there arose howling upon the scene, whereat Arizona Alfred was still lashed to the stake with leathern thongs. Just as Setting Hen had put the match to the pyre to look at it before drawing it along his leg to kindle the fagots the head villager pulled his trigger, and the bullet lighted the match. A shower of baffled rage Setting Hen turned, and in doing so caught the next bullet on the fly in such a way that it drove his collar button down his throat.

"Bang, bang, bang, zippety, bang, bang! Bang, bang, bang, zippety, bang, bang!" were the plaints of the exasperated boys, and the Indians—what was left of them—fled in dismay and confusion, while the Prairie Peach leaped to the center of the stage, cut the cruel thongs and set the lover free.

CHAPTER VI.

"Saved!" shouted Arizona Alfred, in an ecstasy of gratitude, as the Prairie Peach fell into his arms and upon his belladonna bleeder at an angle of 45 degrees in the shade.

The villagers circled in the background, shed tears of delight, and the curtain fell with a dull, sickening thud.

CHAPTER VII.

After a handful of years had flown Arizona Alfred was a handful of years older. He was standing upon the prairie, strumming the mandolin, and the Prairie Peach of the garden of his heart sat beside him in the guano bed. Soon there arose a painful fug—an American rug—the skirts of Setting Hen, spread out like a tiger rug, his feathers sticking out of his skull and his eyes eyes gleaming in the dancing sunshine.

Arizona Alfred's little boys were trying to shoot marbles into a hole in the rug—the hole made by the bullet—and were up by the bullet of the Prairie Peach—the dearest souvenir of the thrilling rescue.

When they were not projecting marbles at the fatal aperture, they were gliding to and fro on a couple of the small toy tricycles carried from the tooting but untoward savage. The white dove of peace flew in the doughnut tree at the portal, and all went merry as a factory bell, which is the signal to stop work for the day.—New York Sunday Journal.

His Inheritance.

Jaspar—Trebullets has inherited a wonderful collection of art works and bric-a-brac.

Jumpuppe—From an ancestor who was a connoisseur, I presume.

Jaspar—Not exactly. From an uncle who was a pawnbroker.—Truth.

He Knew Hen.

She was thinking of motto buttons, but she didn't so specify.

"I wish you would bring me home some buttons," was all she said.

"What kind?" he replied. "You wouldn't sew them on."—Chicago Post.

Misdirected Energy.

Physiognomical.

"I guess it's so," admitted Mr. Colinqueese. "They would seem to indicate some sort of asininity."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

WHIST.

The Board of Directors of the State Whist Association passed the following resolutions: "The Park Club of North Plainfield having won ten games in active contest for the State Challenge Trophy, we hereby congratulate the members of the team which represented the said Park Club in these contests, and transfer with much pleasure to the Park Club, all title to ownership of the trophy now in their possession, and which has been in play in this State since March 1895, and known as the 'Challenge Trophy' of the New Jersey Whist Association. Whereas, the governors of the Park Club, of North Plainfield, in a communication dated November 14, 1896, through the chairman of its Whist Committee, George T. Rogers, generously offer to the New Jersey Whist Association a new trophy to be played for by the clubs composing this association, therefore be it resolved, that the directors of the New Jersey Whist Association accept this gift with a full appreciation of the generosity of this action of the governors of the Park Club, and desire to express the thanks of the New Jersey Whist Association to the donors of the trophy for the liberality expressed by the gift and the value conferred to the whist interest of the State. We consider that this gift from the governors of the Park Club of North Plainfield also expresses their appreciation of the estimable work of the members of the whist team of their club in the games for the State challenge trophy lately, won by them and which we consider fully deserved. The secretary of this association is authorized to send to the governors of the Park Club of North Plainfield notice of the acceptance by this body of the offer to present to the New Jersey Whist Association a new challenge trophy to be open for competition in play by the clubs of the association."

It was decided that this new trophy should be known as the "Park Club Challenge Trophy." The laws governing play for this will be published shortly.

GUILD OFFICERS ELECTED.

Annual Meeting of Needle Workers Held Yesterday.

At the annual meeting of the Plainfield branch of the Needlework Guild of America, held at the home of the former president, Mrs VanNest Talmadge, on Central avenue, the following officers were elected:

President, Mrs. J. Parker Mason. "The Woods," Steele avenue; vice-president Mrs. C. E. Ryder, 101 East Front street; secretary and treasurer, Mrs. Henry C. Adams, 115 East Sixth street. A unanimous vote of thanks was given Mrs. Talmadge for her work the past four years. The 632 new garments thus collected have been distributed among various charities with the exception of 91 articles held in reserve for the directors or any one knowing of pressing need to call upon.

Last year at the time of the annual meeting, Nov. 8th 18 5, there were some two hundred garments in reserve which during the severe cold were thankfully received by many deserving families in absolute want.

If it were only known by the townspeople of the immense amount of good done by this simple charity, every one would wish to lend a helping hand.

Membership consists of giving two new garments a year, and the directors sincerely hope many will show their interest by offering this donation another year.

Mrs. Florence Howe Hall's Lecture.

The spacious parlors of Mrs. F. Wolcott Jackson's residence, 656 High street, were entirely filled this morning with an audience of society women, who gathered to hear the lecture delivered given by Mrs Florence Howe Hall on "Personal Reminiscenses of Distinguished People." Mrs. Hall's ease and charm as a parlor speaker were well suited to the reading of such precious bits of literature as letters written by Longfellow Charles Sumner, Emerson, Lowell and Dr. Holmes to Mrs. Hall's uncle, Dr. Ward, and to her father, Dr Howe. The audience listened with rapt attention and it was plain Mrs Hall's ,memory of her father's associates about old Cambridge, as well as her own personal experience at the school of the naturalist—Agazzz—was properly appreciated Mrs. Hall will give the second of the society series, December 8, at 11 o'clock at the Richardson res.dence 64 Park place.—Newark News.

Death of an Infant Son.

Clifford J. Vroom, the infant son of Edwin and Madeline Vroom, of 48 Harrison street, died at his home Tuesday after a short illness. He was aged five months and three days. The funeral services will be held tomorrow afternoon at 2 30 o'clock from the residence of his parents.

An Elusive Pony.

A pony belonging to Charles Hyde, of East Front street, ran away Tuesday, and it took two men all day to catch the little animal. He chased himself over the mountains several times and the two men finally caught him with the aid of Chief Marshal Wilson, of the borough.

A Parish Reception.

A Parish reception will be given to the Rt. Floyd Appleton, Curate of Grace church, in the guild room on Friday evening, Dec. 4th from 8 to 10 p m. All the members of the congregation are cordially invited to attend.

Miss Bertha Wheeler, of Mountain avenue, entertained a number of friends at her home on Monday evening. The evening passed very pleasantly with dancing and games. The collation was served at midnight.

The condition of Mrs. Williams, of West Front street, remains unchanged. She is in a critical state.

Robbery at North Branch.

Early one morning last week, robbers broke into the house of Henry Vanderveer, a farmer, living near North Branch, and secured $100 in cash, two gold watches and two overcoats. They effected an entrance through a parlor window, went down cellar and up to the kitchen, and then into the room where Mr. Vanderveer slept. The noise awakened him and he called to a hired hand, William VanFleet, who was sleeping upstairs Vanderveer was hit on the head and commanded to keep quiet. VanFleet was afraid to come down and raised a window and called to James Mingle who lives near by. Mr. Mingle got his gun and hastened over, but the burglars were making their escape toward the railroad. He said there were four of them. The night previous, Mr. Huyler, neighbor, was awakened by the barking of his dog, got up and went to the barn, when he saw four men running from his cider press.

FROM O'ER BONNIE LEE

DR. JOHN WATSON LECTURES BEFORE A CULTURED AUDIENCE.

Talks of the Characteristics of the Scottish Race and How They Differ From the People of Other Nations.

Perhaps no one man in the United States is at present exciting more interest than the genial Scottish clergyman, John Maclaren Watson, better known as Ian Maclaren, who wrote the story which in the past year has touched so many thousands of hearts, "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush." Mr. Watson is pastor of the Sefton Park Presbyterian Church, Liverpool, and is a pure Scot, though he was born in England. His lecture tour through the United States has attracted large audiences everywhere, and the lecture he gave in this city Tuesday was no exception. Despite the unpleasant weather, Music Hall has seldom been so thronged, and with such a cultured and appreciative audience.

The stage presented a charming appearance draped with flags, and decorated with a row of plants, chiefly ferns, just within the foot-lights, while rugs, easy chairs, a table and a piano lamp gave a homelike look. Seated on the stage were the following:

Lemuel W. Serrell, Rev. D. J. Yerkes, D. D., Rev. W. R. Richards, D. D., Rev. T. Logan Murphy, Rev. Floyd Appleton, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Boone, Mr. and Mrs. E. E. Runyon, Winfield S. Angleman, Thomas Van Boskerck, Mr. and Mrs. Francis Wood, Mr. and Mrs J. M. Dryden, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Kimball, president of the Board of Managers of the Children's Home, Mrs. E. P. Williams, Miss Florence Williams, Mrs. C. W. Dutcher, Miss Ella Serrell, Miss Cobb, the Misses VanBoskerck, and the members of the Rasores Club of which Mrs. Kimball is president.

The committee that had charge of the decorating of the stage consisted of Mrs. John T. Titsworth, Mrs. E. P. Williams, Mrs. Charles W. McCutchen, and Miss Ella Serrell. The ushers were as follows:—J. Everett Kimball, George Griffin, Harry Patten, Van Rensselaer Schuyler, Louis Neuman, Gilbert Cosley, Alfred E Holmes, Jacob Hower, Edward Petrie and William Corlies.

Mr. Watson was introduced by Mayor Alexander Gilbert, who, while complimenting his distinguished guest, also called the attention of the audience to the fact that the proceeds of the lecture were to go to a most deserving object, the Children's Home, which is just now seriously in need of assistance, as the number of inmates is quite large, and the amount in the treasury very small.

Warm applause greeted Mr. Watson when every word was listened to with closest attention throughout the evening, and looks of eager interest and smiles of appreciation of the speaker's Scotch wit were seen on every side. His was on "Certain Traits of Scottish Character," and was exceedingly bright and entertaining, though its greatest charm was necessarily the personality of the man who made his hearers forget time and place in listening while he drew for them a picture of the Scottish character which they will not soon forget.

You will think me a courageous man, he said, when I name as the first trait of the Scottish character a sense of humor. It is not a characteristic usually accorded to the Scot. But you must remember that different nations make their humor in different ways. When a jest approaches the southern mind it receives it at once and holds carnival over it. When the jest comes to the Scot, if after careful investigation he finds it worthy, no man could give it a more thorough appreciation. According to our outward seriousness is the intenseness of our inward appreciation. Can anyone suppose that two nations of men reared as differently as the French and the Scotch could have the same kind of humor? It may be freely granted that no nation unless perhaps your own, of which I say nothing, can equal the French in the fine flower of humor. An intellect so practical as the Scot's is incapable of drollery. In fun, the English excel all other nations, always excepting your own people. There is nothing intellectual in fun. It makes life go pleasantly, in the home, in politics, and I sometimes think a little fun would make things go more pleasantly in the church.

There is another kind of humor, however, which is more intellectual, but not so much adapted to making life pleasant—irony. If we look for this kind of humor, there is nothing like Scotch humor, it is so dry, so grity. If we cannot offer you all kinds of humor, we can at least give you the strongest kind, irony.

The next trait I want to mention is

GOLFING NEWS.

Course to be Kept Open But Regular Playing Discontinued.

Owing to the likelihood of inclement weather it has been decided to discontinue the Saturday afternoon teas that have been such a feature at the Hillside Tennis and Golf Club during the autumn months. The golf committee will keep the course open as long as the weather will permit, although temporary greens will in all probability be made necessary by the continued frosts.

The large number of applicants for membership since the limit of 150 was was reached some time ago has caused some discussion as to the possibility of increasing the membership but the trustees have decided not to raise the limit until the coming spring at any rate and it is stated on the best authority that the increase, when it comes, will be made a small as possible and will not in all probability exceed 25. Those whose applications have been already posted will be of course the first to reap the benefit of any increase in the membership limit.

It is hoped that it will be possible to keep the course open until January 1, as it was last year but after that date the house will be closed and the fixtures of the course removed but this will not prevent those who wish to practice in fine weather from playing around the course.

G. A. R. OFFICERS ELECTED.

I. L. McVoy to Command Winfield Scott Post for a Year.

The all-important business transacted at the meeting of Winfield Scott Post, No. 73, G. A. R., last Tuesday was the election of officers, which resulted as follows:

A Festive Occasion.

The home of Clarence Bond, corner of Front street and Norwood avenue, was the scene last Tuesday of a festive occasion when he celebrated the anniversary of his birthday. There were guests present from Newark, Orange, Elizabeth and Plainfield. The forepart of the evening was passed in a social manner, after which the young people present formed themselves into a whist party. Refreshments were served in abundance and all present will long remember the event with a great deal of pleasure.

Entering Womanhood.

Miss Try Mattox, of 455 Webster place, celebrated the twentieth anniversary of her birthday, yesterday, in a pleasing manner. Last evening about twenty intimate friends called at her home and gave her a delightful surprise. Games were played, vocal and instrumental music was rendered and the balance of the evening was passed in dancing. The young hos tess received many valuable presents from her friends. A bountiful collation was served after which the guests left for their several homes.

The Dog Got in the Way.

Frank Davey, an employe of Schwed Brothers, met with a lively experience last Tuesday about 6 p. m. He was riding his wheel on Somerset street near Craig place, and in turning out for a passing wagon he ran with much force into a small dog. Davey's wheel was considerably damaged and he was thrown fully fifteen feet. The dog was injured, but as the canine got away so quick, no one knows or cares how much. The rider fortunately escaped without the slightest injury.

FINANCE BEFORE TARIFF

CONGRESSMAN FOWLER'S VIEWS ON LEGISLATION IN CONGRESS.

He is in Favor of Passing an Unequivocal Gold Standard Law and Equalizing Rates of Interests—Other Suggestions.

"Nothing should be done in the way of tariff legislation this session," said Congressman Fowler, of this State, Tuesday to a Newark News correspondent. He added: "The passage of the Dingley bill would prove an almost irretrievable mistake. While more revenue must be provided at the earliest possible moment, the burning question before the American people is the readjustment of our finances and the recomposition of our currency.

"The battle ground of the Presidential campaign was finance, and not tariff. Ten thousand words were printed ;10,000 spoken upon the money question to a syllable printed or uttered on the tariff. Mr. McKinley should be just as wise, courageous and patriotic in his message to Congress when he calls it together, which he will certainly do, as he was in his letter of acceptance. In that letter he led a gallant fight, and he should not falter now, but appealing to the patriotism of the Republicans and of the Democrats through whose assistance the victory was won, he should urge the immediate passage of a financial measure unequivocally establishing the gold standard, retiring the demand obligations of the Goverment and securing to every section of this country equal banking facilities and an equalization of the rates of interest. The commerce and trade of the country demand this, and unless the Republican party anticipates the public will, it can not hope to retain political power.

"Such a financial measure passed, for obvious reasons a tariff bill could be passed without difficulty or delay, and should be passed before this whole country is inundated with the products of foreign mills. The tariff bill passed, a permanent tariff commission should be established to correct the inequalities that will almost immediately develop, and will also make suggestions and recommendations from time to time as progress and changes are made through inventions and discoveries.

"In legislation, as well as everything else, we should adjust our methods to our rapidly changing conditions, realizing that the variations in commerce and trade are greater and more far reaching in one year now than they were in five years forty years ago. Therefore, any tariff law however perfect, which may be passed, may become a monstrosity within the next five years. The only way that we can hope to keep pace with the rapidly and ever-changing conditions of this marvelous age is the one suggested, if we hope to enjoy the advantages of a wise and scientific system of taxation coming through evolution rather than suffer intolerably from business convulsions resulting from tariff revolutions every four or five years."

PAINTERS IN COURT.

Marsh, Ayres & Co. Withdraw Their Suit Against E. E. Marshall.

The case of Marsh, Ayres & Co. against E. E. Marshall, in tort, has been settled in Justice Nash's court by the returning of the progerty in question. It seems that some time ago Dory Vroom borrowed a pair of painters' hooks from Marshall and through some accident the, were lost. At last Marshall wanted to use the hooks and Vroom borrowed a pair from Marsh, Ayres & Co. for the occasion. Marshall kept them for several months and refused to return them until Vroom should replace his which had been lost. The suit followed and Tuesday the hooks were returned and the suit stopped.

CHARGE OF CORRUPTION

ALLEGED THAT MONEY WAS PAID FOR VOTES IN THE CITY ELECTION.

A Prominent Republican Leader Involved in the Charges—The Attention of the Grand Jury Will be Called to the Case.

Though the Republican candidates won in the recent municipal election against a ticket headed by James E. Martine, the "farmer orator," the Democrats do not take their defeat with silence, says a dispatch to the N. Y. Journal Tuesday. Now there is loud proclamations that there was an immense amount of fraud in the purchasing of votes by the G. O. P. workers, and efforts are being made to gather evidence of such wrongs to be presented to the next session of the Grand Jury of Union County for the indictment of the perpetrators.

There are two cases which have come prominently to the surface and in all probability will be used in the endeavor to have the indictments secured. The first is that of a colored man, who went before a Justice a few days ago and stated that he had been approached on election day by a Republican worker, who had openly offered him $2 to vote the Republican ticket. He wanted the justice to get her the evidence necessary for the arrest of the man whom he alleged had attempted to corrupt his suffrage.

The other case is still more flagrant, and comes from the Fourth Ward. During the afternoon of election day a prominent Republican leader approached a Democrat and asked him if he had voted. Though the man had already cast his vote, he replied in the negative and asked the worker how much it was in it.

"I'll give you as much as any other man," was the reply, followed, it is alleged, by the Republican rolling a $2 bill in a Republican ticket and telling the Democrat to go and vote 'that.'"

The Democrat went to the Second District polling place and asked the Democratic inspector if he had voted. The inspector replied in the affirmative at which the man handed the ticket to inspector and asked him to look at it. He unrolled it and the $2 bill dropped out. The incident caused considerable excitement around the polling place, and the man who had been approached told the inspector to keep the ticket and money for future evidence, at the same time mentioning the Republican's name who had given him the ticket and money. The ticket and money are still held by the inspector, and will doubtless be used to secure the indictment of the Republican.

There are other cases where it is alleged that money was used illegitimately, and a lively time is expected as the outcome.

Old Partners Reunited.

The many friends of the old piano firm of Vanderbeek & Sattels will be pleased to learn that they have again united in business at the old stand. Mr. Vanderbeek was obliged, owing to serious illness, to retire from business, but as he has regained his health, he decided to enter business again, and he purchased one-half interest from Joseph Sattels in the old-established piano business.

A FOOD TALK.

Interested Housewives Hear a Practical Sort of a Lecture.

That the intelligent housekeepers of Plainfield appreciate a good thing was fully established Tuesday afternoon, when a very large number of them completely filled the Y. M. C. A. Hall to hear E. B. Worrell give a lecture on the entire range of food. Mr. Worrell represents the Walter Baker & Company, manufacturers of cocoa and chocolate, which are known the world over. The platform was arranged attractively with an exhibit of raw food products, while on either side was placed enlarged pictures of the ever-familiar trade-mark of the company. Mr. Worrell is a highly cultured person and thoroughly understands the subjects he discusses.

He treated the subject of food products, as a body-builder, in a clear and intelligent manner, and showed the different percentage of foods which go to make up a healthful body. He then discussed the subject of food adulteration, as being cheap and injurious.

At the close of the lecture, Mr. Worrell's assistants presented each woman with a sample box of the Walter Baker & Company's goods. Many of the women remained and talked person ally with Mr. Worrell and they found that he was affable and painstaking in answering their questions.

JUSTICES WERE ABSENT.

Middlesex County Grand Jury Retired Without Being Charged.

The December term of the Middlesex County Courts began Tuesday morning. Chief Justice Beasley, who presides over the Middlesex Circuit, could not be present, and had arranged with Circuit Judge Miller, appointed to relieve the pressure on Supreme Court justices, to preside in his stead. Justice Miller, however, failed to arrive, and a telephone message to the Chief Justice elicited no reason why he was absent. Judge Woodbridge Strong, of the Middlesex County Courts, at 11 o'clock had the Grand Jury sworn, and they retired without being charged. It is Sheriff Latimer's first Grand Jury, and Assemblyman George H. Tice, of Perth Amboy, is its foreman. The civil cases were called and dates fixed, with the understanding that the preemptory call will take place to day when Judge Miller will be present. The assault case of Charles Wood against Frank Vosseler, both of this city, was considered by the Grand Jury yesterday.

A SERIOUS DELAY.

The Proposed New Road to Bound Brook Dragged Into Court.

A temporary stop has been put to the proceedings for the building of the new road from Dunellen to Bound Brook. A caveat has been served and it will be necessary to wait until the next term of court in April to have the proceedings reviewed. The caveat was secured by M. H. Close, who resides on the present road between the two places. Although he owns no property along the line of the proposed thoroughfare it is understood that his opposition is caused by his fear that the new road would take away all the traffic from the present road.

The Runaways Sent to Elizabeth.

The two young runaways, Lewis Milligan and Charles Wilson, were taken to the county jail at Elizabeth Tuesday afternoon. Owing to the large crowd of curious spectators about the North Avenue station, the boys were taken to the Netherwood station, from where they took the train for Elizabeth. They seemed to have recovered from the downhearted-ness and bid their friends goodbye in a very cheerful manner.

FOR BETTER SCHOOLS

IMPORTANT MATTERS DISCUSSED BY SUPERINTENDENT BAXTER.

The Secondary Schools Largely in Need of Improvement in New Jersey—A Clear Exposition of What is Required.

In the annual report of State Superintendent of Public Instruction Baxter, of this city, one of the most interesting portions is that relating to the establishment and improvement of secondary schools. He strongly recommends legislation which will lead to the development of them. In speaking of secondary schools, Superintendent Baxter says:

"This important subject was ably discussed by my predecessor in his annual report one year ago. But it is one of such vital importance to the State that it seems an unpardonable omission of duty to do otherwise than continue its agitation. It should be kept in the public mind until legislation tending to the encouragement of such schools is secured.

"Anyone interested in educational affairs cannot have failed to observe that in every town or village where a high school has been established, it has resulted in the betterment of the entire school system. In employing a competent head for such school they also secured supervision that systematized and improved all the lower grades.

"In many places the tenure of office of incompetent and inefficient teachers has long been extended because there was no one qualified to correctly judge of the merits of their work; and the employment of a proper educational head has resulted in a long-needed weeding out and general awakening.

"The argument that the State has enough to do to take care of her common elementary schools, these cost all the people are either able or willing to pay for, is altogether specious, and misleading. Granting that the taxpayer is already burdened, then it behooves us to give him good value. It is in the support of schools either indifferent or poor—common in name and worse than common in quality—that money is wasted. Those intrusted with the oversight of the school affairs of the State, and in a position to direct its educational policy, should not suffer themselves to be influenced by an unwise and mistaken sentiment that is not largely prevalent.

"In the spring of 1635, one hundred and forty-seven years before the Declaration of Independence, the Public Latin School, of Boston, which is still in existence, was founded. In 1647, the General Court of the Massachusetts Colony decreed that when any town shall set up a grammar school, the master thereof being able to instruct youth so far that they may be fitted for the university.'

"Here in quaint phrase is stated the cause of the generally admitted educational supremacy of that common wealth. The Bay State started right, and she has generally continued in the right line of progress. We find there today the secondary or high school so largely in evidence that it is within reach of all who choose to avail themselves of its advantages. It is to be found in every town or village of any importance, and sometimes at the country crossroads. In portions of that State visited during vacation outings, it has seemed as though every other man was a college graduate, and this condition of exceptional average intelligence is directly traceable to the influence of its secondary schools.

"The tendency of the college is toward the rounding out and elevation of the high school, and that of the high school toward the betterment of all the grades below it; thus, in the educational as in the material world, light comes from above.

"In New York and many of the Western States they have by legislative enactments given aid and encouragement to secondary education, and it is greatly to be regretted that New Jersey has thus far taken no definite action in this matter.

"If we would add 5 per cent to the amount already appropriated for the support of our elementary and grammar schools, and devote this increase to the establishment and support of secondary schools, we would add 100 per cent to the efficiency of the present school system.

"As action in this matter is most important, should be definite and effective and not longer delayed, I beg to recommend that the law governing the taking of the school census be amended so as to include all children between the ages of 4 and 18 years, instead of between 5 and 18 years. That the increased amount raised from this charge in minimum age

MIRTH AND MELODY MIX

AND THE TWO ENTERTAIN A LARGE AUDIENCE IN Y. M. C. A. HALL.

The Programme Presented at the Entertainment of the Benevolent Band of King's Daughters Was Very Good.

Many entertainments have been given in Plainfield but none more enjoyable than the one held in the Y. M. C. A. hall last Friday, under the auspices of the Benevolent Band of King's Daughters for the benefit of the city nurse. The cause was a good one and the programme was certainly one also. It is rarely that an audience is treated to such a collection of well rendered selections as was heard last night by a large and thoroughly enthusiastic assemblage that filled the little hall.

The stage was arranged for the occasion with palms and potted plants at the corners, and a handsome screen and chairs, giving it the appearance of a drawing room.

The programme opened with a delightful selection by Mrs. Minnie Marshall-Smith, the talented reader. The selection was one full of feeling and was given by Mrs. Smith in a way that carried her hearers with her. Frank J. Smith acted as accompanist and kept up a soft melody that made the rendition all the more impressive. As she smilingly bowed to her audience at the conclusion of her reading the spell that seemed to rest over her hearers was broken, and they burst into loud and hearty applause. Her encore was of a different style but it pleased the audience even better.

The well known ballad of Long fellow's "Excelsior" was sung by a male chorus composed of Elmer Runyon, George O. Stevens, first tenors; Walter Place, George B. Schoonmaker, Ben Abbott, Andrew J. Selz, second tenors; Charles L. Lewis, Jose Macardo, Walter J. Funk, first basses; William N. Runyon, Fred H. Walz, C. G. Hill, second basses. The selection was well given, the many voices blending very harmoniously together. Mr. Smith was the accompanist. A baritone solo, "The Heart of a Sailor," was sung by Charles L. Lewis in a manner that called forth hearty applause which would not cease until he sang again.

"Adagio Patherique" was the title of the violin solo by Miss Nelly Udell and very artisticly was it rendered. Her touch was light and yet firm and she seemed to have perfect control over her instrument at all times. Her playing was of a high order and she deserved the continued applause that was accorded her. He encore was also excellently rendered.

Another selection by Mrs. Smith well suited the audience. It was "The Marriage of the Flowers," and it was given in as charming a manner as the others. In response to the applause that followed it she told in an irresistably funny way some of the experiences of Mr and Mrs. Pike in their early married life.

The appearance of Councilman elect William N. Runyon was the signal for another round of applause. He sang "My Old Dutch," in his well-known style, and then followed with two well-known Negro ballads in response to the universal demand for more. Miss Udell made her second appearance and was as well received as before. Her selections were a "Cradle Song" and "Tarantella," and they were rendered with admirable skill.

"Behind the Curtain, by Mrs Burton Harrison, was Mrs. Smith's next number, which was given in a very dramatic manner that captivated her audience. Her encore was a dainty piece entitled "Money Musk." The piano accompaniment by her husband made it much more effective. Three short solos by Mr. Lewis followed and were heartily applauded. They were "My Memories," "Let Me Believe" and "Beauty's Eyes." In the last Miss Udell played a violin obligato.

The programme ended with a tragical cantata entitled, "The Grasshopper." The audience prepared to weep after seeing the title, and they did, but it was from laughing so hard. Those that took part in this heart-rending selection were the young men that sang in the opening male chorus. They sat around in a half circle with Mr. Lewis in the centre. They began by singing a very mournful ditty of four lines that told of a grasshopper that sat on a sweet potato vine and how a big turkey gobbler came up behind and gobbled up the poor grasshopper. In an extremely doleful voice Mr. Lewis explained the different verses or at least the different renderings of the one solitary verse. They sang it as the grasshopper would have sung it, and they were so affected by it that they wept. They told it as the villian would have, and repeated the story in a solo ballad form with solemn faces, while the audience roared with laughter. They finally ended with a grand chorus on the subject that brought down the house.

This very successful entertainment was gotten up by the Benevolent Band of King's Daughters, of which Mrs. W. L. C. Glenney is the efficient president. The committee of arrangements for the entertainment consisted of Mrs. F. S. Martin, Mrs. Charles King, Mrs. William Myers and Miss Ella Martine. F. S Martin presided over the ticket window and W. L. C Glenney looked after the door. The ushers were Harry Patton, Clifford Halloway, Edward Hobby, Lester Glenny and Van R. Schu ler.

Of the singers, Messrs. Hill, Abbott, Funk, and Selz were from the University of New York.

PREACHING GOSPEL AND DOING GOOD

Report of Missionary Work Being Done in Western States.

The quarterly meeting of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Crescent Avenue church was held in the chapel of the church Friday afternoon. The meeting took the form of a praise and Thanksgiving service. Miss Hardenberg, contralto, of the church choir, was present and rendered a beautiful solo. Mrs. Pearson, of Elizabeth, was then introduced by the president and she gave an interesting talk of the work being done by the Presbyterian missionaries in New Mexico, especially among the schools which have been established Mrs. Pearson declared that there was Mormonism in Utah, notwithstanding the fact that politicians were strenuously trying to hid it.

She spoke of the magnificent school at Santa Fe, in charge of Miss Allison, and while the Presbyterian work there outnumbered that done by all other denominations, including the Roman Catholics, Mrs. Pearson did not think that that was saying very much.

IN HONOR OF A TEACHER

HOPE CHAPEL MEMBERS RECOGNIZE THE WORK OF SILAS YERKES.

The Sunday School Class of Which He is Instructor Numbers About 120 and is Made Up of the Older Members.

The ladies' senior Bible class of Hope Chapel gave an entertainment in the chapel last Friday, in honor of Silas Yerkes, who is their teacher. Mr. Yerkes had the honor of presiding over this class of ladies for over three years, during which time the class has made a rapid yet steady growth. At the present time the class numbers close to 150, most of these ladies being mothers, in fact some of them grandmothers with their grandchildren attending the same school.

An excellent programme was presented with Rev. G. K. Newell presiding. After the opening ceremony Mr. Newell paid a high tribute to Mr. Yerkes and his class, complimenting them upon their regular attendance and their studious attention to their teacher.

He also ascribed great credit to them for their earnestness in the performance of their several duties in connection with the work of the chapel. Mr. Yerkes in behalf of himself and the class suitably responded. The social parts of the programme were then entered into in earnest. When several selections of music, songs and appropriate recitations were rendered.

The committee of arrangements which consisted of Mrs. J. B. Higgins, Mrs. D. McInnes, Mrs. N Head, Mrs. C. Foster, Mrs. J. Bushby, Mrs. J. Montgomery, and Mrs. Cox, deserve to be remembered with thanks for the very efficient and satisfactory manner in which they arranged the programme.

It is interesting to note that the majority of the gentlemen present were the husbands of the ladies who gave the entertainment. It is also highly gratifying to know that these wives and husbands study the Word of God regularly every Sunday. The senior male and female classes number at the present time over 250, and it is evident that Hope chapel has become a power for good in the western part of the city.

The following programme was rendered: Prayer, Rev. G. K. Newell; piano solo, Miss L. Firstbrook; song, Fred Wharton; recitation, Lenna Gerhold; address, Rev. G. K. Newell; piano solo, Miss L. Firstbrook; recitation, George Leighs; address, Silas Yerkes; recitation, Hannah Higgins.

A SOURCE OF POLLUTION.

From Where Does the Oil and Refuse Flow Into Green Brook Now?

To the Editor of The Daily Press:—

In your issue of December 2d you call attention, and justly so, to the odor arising from the catch-basin at the corner of West Front and New streets. If the Board of Health of this city, provided there is such a body in existence, would send their Health Inspector to examine the mouth of this sewer he would find that gallons of foul-smelling oil comes out of it and flows into Green brook, polluting its waters for a long distance. Whence comes this refuse oil. Can it be possible that by some break in the sewer, or other mishap, the exhaust steam and waste oil of the Electric Light Company goes into the sewer and thus into the brook? Who can tell, and whose business is it to find out, if the Health Board does not?

BURGLARIZED A BUTCHER SHOP.

George Egel's Place Broken Into and Meat Stolen.

Sometime during Friday night the butcher shop owned by George Egel, on Somerset street, was partially entered and several partridge, quail and rabbits were taken. Over the main doors there is a swinging transom and this was left open. The game was left hanging on hooks near the transom and it was an easy matter for any one to have taken them. Mr. Egel did not know of his loss until he opened his store this morning and found a pair of rabbits on the floor which had been dropped by the thieves in their attempt to take the game.

The robbery was reported to Chief Marshal Wilson who will investigate the matter at once. He has an idea as to who the thieves are and they will be watched.

The Jolly Whists.

The Jolly Whist Club met Thursday evening at the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Buckle, on Westervelt avenue. Mr. Tolles and Mr. Buckle were awarded first and second prizes for the men, while Mrs. P. A. Emmons and Mrs Woodruff secured the first and second prizes for the women. The next meeting will be at the home of Mr. and Mrs. R. I. Tolles, on Orange street.

Miss Reba Tinsman, of Lumberville, has returned home after a visit with the Misses Livesay, of Park avenue.

Julius Williams, of Elmwood place, arrived home Saturday night after a six weeks business trip through the west.

The regular batch of claims was received and ordered paid.

Mr. Woolston, of the street committee, stated that the street work during the past month had cost $202.59, and he reported that there was yet about four days work on Watchung avenue.

Mr. Valiant, of the laws, ordinance and election committee, said that the petition referred to the committee regarding the Washingtonville ice pond and dam now in course of construction, had been considered and the members found that they were not able to decide in the matter, so they retained the services of an engineer who had furnished them with facts concerning the matter. The engineer consulted was Joseph O. Osgood, of Washington Park.

He stated that he had examined the plans and specifications of the pond and dam and had concluded that they were made without surveys to supply a demand for cheap work. He did not think the plans were being adhered to and if they should be followed he considered they were insufficient. In the plans no provision had been made for floods and no calculation made as to how much water the pond would hold. Mr. Osgood said that the pond would hold between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 cubic feet of water, and there was great danger that the borough would suffer to a considerable extent if the dam should break or there should be an overflow. He considered that the affair had been planned with as little expense as possible. On November 10th Mr. Osgood made a visit to the place where the pond is located, and after an inspection he advised that constant supervision of the work was necessary to secure the best results. After that time the company had more extensive plans made by F. A Dunham, and after Mr. Osgood had examined the plans he said that it was evident that the company does not intend constructing the pond and dam with an idea to safety.

The above information from Mr. Osgood was communicated to the Council by letters read by Mr. Valiant. The latter said that he thought the situation was one for general alarm. One person, who signed the petition against the construction, had secured the services of an engineer who after investigation found that the structure was not substantial.

Mr. Peck stated that the fire, water and lamps committee had placed a new furnace in Warren Engine Company's house at a cost of $108, which action was absolutely necessary. The same member then offered several resolutions, the first of which was that a warrant for $1,033 42 be drawn in favor of H. N. Spencer to meet the $1,000 note with interest, due December 20th; the second resolution was that a warrant be drawn for $866 in favor of the Gamewell Fire Alarm Company to meet the $800 note with interest, due December 15th.

Another resolution offered by Mr. Peck granted an exemption certificate to H. A. Woolston who had served seven in the fire department.

Mr. Bennett offered a resolution that the action of Collector Spencer in paying the monthly pay roll amounting to $202.59 be confirmed. Another resolution offered by the same member provided that a warrant for $700 be drawn in favor of Contractor Bowden on account of the Watchung avenue extension and the same be charged to F. A. Dunham. The above two resolutions were adopted, as was also one offered by Mr. Woolston that a warrant for $225.07 be drawn in favor of H. N. Spencer to meet the $1,000 note due December 15th, the same to be charged to the road account.

At this time S. B. Joseph, who was present, was given the privilege of the floor and he spoke to the council somewhat as follows:

"I desire to speak not as a firemen but as a taxpayer. I am heartily in favor of all improvements in our borough, but I feel that the introduction of a hose company in the West End at an expense of $2,000 is useless and unnecessary. As matters now exist with the water hydrants in that part of the borough, and good roads, the firemen are able to do the best work. If you follow out your present plans you will find the present system of fire alarm useless to those in the West End, as has been demonstrated already, for you cannot awake those in that section. As a firemen I will say that the department is in good working order, but it is deficient in not having ladders to work with. I would advise that a hook and ladder truck be purchased instead of the other expenditure. It could be placed in the old electric light station or in a portion of the Heyinger building. Thus we would be able to handle any fire we might have. Our department will compare favorably with any voluntary department in this state."

Mr Pangborn, of Chatham street, then appeared before the Council and asked the members to go with him through Chatham street, that they might see how some one had failed to do their duty in not placing lights there.

Mr. Pangborn said that he had just previously escaped a serious accident, and on Sunday night last he had met with a similar experience and Mayor Hegeman assured Mr. Pangborn that the matter would be attended to at once.

This concluded the business of the evening and the council adjourned.

ROUNDED THEIR FIVE YEAR MARK.

Seventh-day Baptist Church Celebrate an Anniversary.

The Christian Endeavor Society of the Seventh-day Baptist church celebrated its fifth anniversary last Saturday at the church, which was tastefully decorated for the occasion with palms and potted plants. The meeting was presided over by Miss Ernestine Smith, president of the Society, and a large chorus choir assisted in the singing. After the Juniors marched in together singing the meeting opened with a Scripture reading by the president, and a prayer by Rev. L. E. Livermore.

The secretary's report showed that the society had gained from 16 to 86 membership during the five years. The third annual report of the Junior society was made by the Superindent, Mrs. H. M. Maxson and gave the present membership as 35, with an average attendance of 28. The amount raised by the Juniors during the year was $22.98.

Then followed five papers with the initial letters taken from the Y. P. S. C. E. The first was "Youthful service" by Jacob Barker and he told of the better results of work with the young than with the old. "Prayer" was the topic of Miss Ida L. Spicer's paper in which she told of the efficacy of prayer and thow strength, faith and earnest work would result. Miss Lou Clanson told of "Sociability" and how it aided in the good work of the church and brought strangers and backsliders into the fold.

"Consecration" was the title of Miss Louise Lewis' paper and she said that though all cannot be missionaries, everybody can, in everyday life, do little acts consecrated to Christ's service.

"Education" was the last of the papers and was given by Prof. H. M. Maxson, and he told how the human soul can be educated to do many things and how by constant effort the sinner can learn to love God and believe in Him.

Rev. A. E. Main closed the meeting with a few words on the choice between the two roads, the choice of the good and evil character.

Cut Her Forearm.

Miss Muldowney lost a considerable amount of blood as a result of the accident, but she is recovering.

TRINITY'S FUN MAKERS.

EVENING OF PLEASURE FOR VISITORS AND PROFIT FOR CHURCH WORKERS.

Rev. C. E. Herring Told of Some of His Odd Experiences While Wandering Through Foreign Climes Last Summer.

The sociable and musical entertainment given under the auspices of the Ladies' Christian Work Society of Trinity Reformed church, which was postponed from Friday, November 26th, on account of the illness of Rev. Cornelius Schenck, the pastor, took place in the church parlors last Friday, but owing to other entertainments and meetings in various parts of the city, the attendance was not as large as was anticipated.

Superintendent Edward B. Anthony presided and announced the numbers from an informal programme, beginning with a beautiful selection by a quartette composed of Mrs. Asa Collier, Mrs. B. H. Bird, Robert Clark and F. S. Cutter. Mrs. Ryder and Mr. Cutter followed, each with a solo, and a trio composed of Mrs. Ryder, Mrs. Collier and Mrs. Bird, next favored the audience with a delightful vocal rendition. Mrs Collier gave another soprano solo, after which Superintendent Anthony in a few well selected and humorous remarks introduced Rev. Mr. Herring, pastor of the First Presbyterian church, who gave an interesting ten minute talk on his travels in Europe and the "Life of Women on the Other Side." "Distance lends enchantment," said he, "and that's one reason I never took one to my side. Italy is noted for its very many pretty women, and especially those employed in the stores."

Rev. Mr. Herring told of his going into a shop in Naples to buy a spool of thread and some needles, but they didn't sell the two commodities in the same place. These purchases were made necessary, he said, on account of rents in his trousers caused by continued wheeling. He, however, found a good Samaritan in the person of a woman who patched the pants while he waited. The kindness shown him by the Italians was something remarkable. In both Germany and Italy, men, women, cows and even dogs are equal laborers, and in parts of Germany women are employed to flag the railroad trains. In Naples cows are milked in the street and the milk sold by the glass.

Dr. Herring said he saw many female bicyclists, but no ladies wheels. He also told of the varieties of fruits grown in Italy, including watermelons and twenty-eight varieties of lemons. In Rome, cantilopes are the prevailing fruit. Ice cream is sold for six cents a plate in Rome, and only at night. "But," said the speaker, in conclusion, "one can forego the many disadvantages of travel, etc., for the sake of seeing the beautiful sights of Italy and particularly Rome in all its glories."

Mr. Clark and Mrs. Collier each favored the audience with a solo, after which Superintendent Anthony jokingly referred to the following next sextette and the position they occupy on the diamond: Mr. Clark, first base; Mr. Dunham, second base; Mr Dunn, short stop; Mr VanEmburgh, third base; Mr. Meeker, pitcher; and Mr. Gayle catcher—to catch the money for church purposes.

Waiters and waitresses then served delicious ice cream and cake in abundance, and after an hour or so of social chat, the gatherings broke up, thus ending another of the many delightful entertainments for which the Trinity Reformed church people are so justly noted.

The committee of arrangements consisted of Mrs. E. T. VanWinkle, chairman, Mrs. J. F. MacDonald, Mrs. A. M. Gillem, Mrs. John C. VanDyke, Mrs. P. M. Demarest and Mrs. F. A. Church.

SOME MISSIONARY HINTS

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH WOMEN HEAR WORKING IDEAS.

Mrs. Wells Tells How to Arouse Interest in the Societies Organized in Churches to Encourage This Excellent Work.

The Woman's Association of the Congregational church held its regular fortnightly meeting Thursday afternoon in the church parlors. The opening devotional service was conducted by the president, Mrs. Charles Lyman Goodrich, and included sentence prayers, a short reading from "Moral Evolution," and a vocal solo, "Consecration," with autoharp accompaniment, by one of the young women of the society. The especial feature of the meeting was the reading of a paper on "Programmes, and the Art of Making Them," by Mrs. Wells, president of the Woman's Association of the Congregational church in Westfield. This paper was the same which was read by Mrs. Wells a short time ago at a large union meeting of Woman's Missionary societies in Philadelphia, and was a very practical and suggestive one. It advocated definiteness and variety in preparing programmes for missionary meetings. Mrs. Wells said that it was well to undertake the study of too large a field, thereby getting no clear idea of anything, or to attempt to study everything in the same way. She gave a number of excellent hints for varying missionary meetings, which deserve to be brought before any missionary society which desires to increase the interest of its meetings.

One plan was to hold a faggot party, in some pleasant private house, where each guest should lay a stick on the fire, and tell a missionary story. Another was the writing of a missionary serial story, one member to write one chapter and then hand it to another, one after another taking up the story until the last brought it to a conclusion. "We spend a great deal of time and trouble," Mrs. Wells said, "in preparing new and striking features for our literary societies; why do we not try as hard to make our missionary meetings novel and interesting?"

After another solo, "Let a little sunshine in," and an informal discussion of the subject, the meeting was adjourned, and tea was served, while a social hour was enjoyed by all present. Miss Ellis, of Netherwood, presided over the little tea table, daisy with its embroidered linen cover, silver and china, and lighted candles, and the cups were handed about by Mrs. Goodrich, Miss Morse and Miss Jenkins.

STATE BOARD OF EDCATION.

Superintendent Charles J. Baxter Presents His Annual Report.

The State Board of Education met last week Tuesday and re-elected Dr. Lloyd Wilbur, of Hightstown Supervisor of the School Census, his term expiring at that time.

The annual report of the State Superintendent Charles J. Baxter, of this city, which is practically completed, states that the new township law is working well, and that the attendance at the schools is larger and more regular than it has been in the past under the old law. The report shows that there are nearly one hundred more teachers employed this year than last, and that there has been a small increase in teachers salaries.

Dispute Over a Board Bill.

The case of Clara E. Williams against Arthur Wyckoff, in tort, was settled in Justice Nash's court Thursday. Both plaintiff and defendant were colored. The trouble arose over the alleged fact that Miss Williams did not pay her board. She was boarding at the Wyckoff's and the latter state that as she did not pay her board they held her trunk for security. They did not go about it according to true process of law and when sued gave up the trunk.

A Dime Sociable.

One of a series of dime sociables under the auspices of Minerva Temple, No. 4, B. S., to replenish their relief fund, was held at the residence of Mrs. Andrew Mattis, of Madison avenue, last Thursday. There were about fifty present, and the evening was spent in playing games, dancing and other amusements. Refreshments were served.

Chapel to Become a Church.

The Monroe Avenue chapel is soon to be a regularly ordained church. The letters will be received at a "watch" meeting to be held in the chapel on New Year's Eve, to which all the M. E. churches in the city will be invited.

TURKEY AND KNICKNACKS

KING'S DAUGHTERS' SUCCESSFUL SALE AND SUPPER.

The Old Post Office Building Transformed Into a Mart Wherein the Visitor Left His Coin Willingly.

The Advance Circle, King's Daughters, of the First Presbyterian church, under whose auspices the turkey supper and sale was held last week in the old postoffice building, was very successful in the efforts put forth to raise money to assist in the grand work which this society is doing. The large room was prettily decorated with various colors in bunting, while the National colors were given due prominence. About the rooms tables were arranged. Each person who entered the place was met by Edward Hazen, whose genial manner induced them to proceed further and learn what was in store for them. To the left was the candy table, where, under the direction of Mrs. Geo. O. Stevens and Miss Katherine Glen, the choicest candies were dispensed.

Nearby was the fancy goods table, with an abundance of useful an ornamental articles. This table was in charge of Mrs. William A. Coddington and Miss Smalley. The cake table with a variety of the best home made cakes was under the able direction of Miss Bittenbender and Miss Scarborough.

Another table supplied with flowers was in charge of Mrs. J. E. McClintock and Mrs. Garretson.

As an extra attraction a "mystery" table was arranged where, for a small fee, a person secure most anything from a doll to a house and lot. This was under the direction of Mrs. J. E. Beeshower and Mrs. J. A. Smith.

The rear half of the room was devoted to tables where one could sit down and enjoy one of the best turkey suppers of the season. The supper included everything that the inner man could desire and the efficient service of those in charge was noteworthy. Mrs. J. A. Haynes was in charge of the supper department, and she was ably assisted by Miss Pansy Jean Herring, Miss Margaret Cove, Miss Susie Boss, Miss Boss, Miss Mang, Miss Lizzie Bittenbender, Miss Pruden and Miss Remsen, as waitresses.

Mrs. H. A. Pope was chairman of the reception committee and her affable manner won many dollars of profit.

To J. A. Haynes, A. V. Searing and H. A. Pope is due much credit, for they carved nearly ten turkeys which were readily disposed.

Miss Blish was treasurer and she with her accustomed accuracy received all money from the sales. A feature of the event was the presentation of a very large pyramid cake to Rev. C. E. Herring. There were seven cakes in all and it was made by Mrs. J. A. Haynes.

Between the stated hours, 5 to 10 p. m., the room was thronged with friends of the circle and as a result of the affair about $95 will be realized as profit. This money will be used for missionary purposes as the circle decides to expend it. Toward the latter part of the evening George O. Stevens was induced to act as auctioneer and he assisted in adding many dollars to the treasury.

FOR GREATER STORAGE.

Plainfield Ice Company Arranging to Keep Large Quantities of Ice.

The ruined ice house at the Wilson pond, Washingtonville, is now being torn down and a new and much larger one will be put up in its place on the same spot. The ice house is being built by the Plainfield Ice and Cold Storage Company which owns the pond. The same company is planning for the erection of another new ice house near their new ice pond which is now partially completed. The latter will be a large and commodous one and capable of holding a large amount of ice.

Andrew Wilson and Alfred Coddington, of the company, went to Pennsylvania, last week, after lumber to build the new houses with. Work has already begun and the old ruined ice house is rapidly being pulled down.

Tampered With the Votes.

There is considerable talk of bringing some of the workers in the Second ward before the Grand Jury for tampering with voters at the last election. The alleged offence is said to have been committed on last Tuesday morning and one of the local justices has been consulted regarding the making of the complaint.

Thanks Extended.

The Relief Association desires to express its thanks for the donations towards Thanksgiving dinners for the poor. Owing to the very liberal contributions of individuals as well as of two of the churches of Plainfield, it was possible to furnish dinners to 76 families. Mrs. Charles E. Brooks, secretary.

Borough Election.

The term of Borough Councilmen Valiant and Peck expire next March and there is a probability that they may be re-elected.

THE CHECK WAS NO GOOD

BUT MRS. E. L. BIRD CASHED IT AND GAVE $11 IN CHANGE.

A Clever Swindler Pretends to Pay for Board in Advance in Presenting a Worthless Check—No Trace of Him.

He was a real nice, confiding young man, and he wanted to engage board for himself and brother with Mrs. E. L. Bird and mother, Mrs. George Leland, of 401 West Front street, who conduct a boarding house. He talked so intimately of John Vetterlein, an old friend of the family, and also spoke of Mrs. Vetterlein and the children, that Mrs. Bird was convinced that he was all right.

He gave his name as Fred Mayer, and said he was an insurance agent, and had just established himself in the First National Bank building, while his brother, who was also an insurance agent, was located in the Babcock building. He appeared to be a real good young man, and wanted to pay the board bill in advance. He didn't happen to have the money, but would Mrs. Bird mind cashing a check? He gave the impression that the check was signed by Mr. Vetterlein, but when Mrs Bird handed over $11 in change and received a check for $20, it was Fred Mayer's name which was signed to it. He smilingly departed with the $11 in his pocket. They haven't seen him since, and regret the fact exceedingly.

This happened last week Thursday and they took the check down to the First National Bank to have it cashed at once. The check was drawn on that bank and Mr. Leland was politely informed that it was not worth a cent.

The alleged officers of the Mayer brothers could not be found and Roundsman Mattox was notified, but failed to find the clever swindler as he had plenty of time to make his escape.

Mrs. Bird is completely disgusted at the way in which she was duped but the young man's evident acquaintance with the Vetterlein family dis armed suspicion.

He was a good looking young German and spoke in broken English He had red cheeks, light hair and a slight mustache. The one noticeable feature of his appearance was the absence of one of his front teeth.

FIRE AT DUNELLEN.

A Barn and Livestock Consumed in the Afternoon.

Dunellen had a disastrous conflagration Thursday afternoon of last week. At that time flames and smoke were seen issuing from the barn on what is known as the Hardingham place, corner of Madison avenue and Fifth street, in a somewhat isolated part of the borough toward Greenbrook. A general alarm was sent out and the Dunellen fire department responded with its usual alcerity, but little or nothing could be done toward saving the barn, and the efforts of the firemen were directed to saving the house, Fortunately for them, which caught fire and was also threatened with total destruction. The department apparatus, it is said, was practically useless, although there was a bountiful supply of water in a pond near by.

The premises are occupied by Mrs. Lolo Earl, a South American woman, who took possession only a few weeks ago. Besides the barn there were burned a valuable carriage horse, a heifer, seven pigeons and a large lot of hay, straw, oats, etc. Two tons of hay had just been deposited in the loft, and the carters were on their way for more when the fire broke out.

The origin of the fire is a mystery. It started on the ground floor, directly in front of the manger where the horse was tied. The poor animal after the lead strap and halter had been burned from its head, managed to walk into the yard, where it fell dead.

A Marked Improvement.

One of the latest improvements to Front street property will soon be started by Mrs. Tobin, of Newark, who owns the property next to Swain's art store. The present old frame structure will be torn down and in its place will be erected a handsome, modern three story brick building which will be a credit to the city. On the first floor there will be stores and the second floor will be used as flats, while provisions will be made for a lodge room on the top floor. The contract for the work will be given out in a few days and the work of moving the present building and starting the new one will commence at once.

Mayor Gilbert to Travel.

Mayor Alex. Gilbert, of West Eighth street, leaves Plainfield about the middle of January for a trip through the Orient and the Mediterranean countries.

A New Lodge.

A new lodge of Daughters of Pocohontas has been formed in this city and at a preliminary meeting held last week it was decided to call it after one of the lodges of Red Men, the Paugh Caugh Naugh Sinque lodge. Another meeting will be held on Monday night at which some new members will be elected.

NEW CLEVER RIDING ACT.

BOB WHITTAKER AND HIS HORSE TO APPEAR IN MUSIC HALLS.

The New Act is an English Riding One and is Marked by Two Startling Features in Horse Training and Intelligence.

Robert Whittaker, the famous bareback rider who is known to all the circusgoers in the country, and who resides in this city in a quiet and unostentacious manner when not receiving plaudits for his graceful and daring performance with his famous horse, Dobiman, in the tented arena, has just returned from the training quarters of Aberiodi Lowandi, at Bound Brook, after having originated a new act which he and his intelligent animal are to appear in the music halls of this and other countries. Mr. Whittaker has originated many of the famous circus acts which delight and astonish amusement lovers, and in his new innovation, which he terms an English riding act, he accomplishes many feats and tricks which shows that he has lost none of his old ability and success in this line.

In this new act Mr. Whittaker rides Dobiman in several differ nt positions at the opening, and finally works up to two principal features that are sensational and startling in their climax. The first is when Dobiman kneels in the centre of the ring on his two fore knees, remaining in that position for a few moments while Mr. Whittaker assumes a graceful pose on one leg. Then Dobiman turns to his side and his trainer produces a pistol emblazioned with American flags and discharges it over the horse's head. the animal laying quietly as though he was peacefully munching oats instead of having a weapon discharged so near at hand. Then Mr. Whitaker rises along side of Dobiman and the intelligent horse turns his head and kisses him as lovingly as a babe would kiss its mother.

After this a few more manoeuvres are gone through with on horseback and then Dahiman ascends an inclined platform twenty inches high, and on the end of which is a pedestal and staff. The horse puts one foot on the pedestal and the other forepaw he raises to the top of the staff, and in this position while Mr. Whittaker is making a graceful pose on his back the animal goes on and ends the act. This last position is a wonderful one for a horse to assume and shows the intelligence of the animal and the careful training which his owner has given.

As the curtain drops his fore legs are several feet above the level of the stage, and the sight is an imperial one.

WED IN A HOME CIRCLE.

HAPPY LOVERS JOINED BY REV. J. O. McKELVEY LAST EVENING.

The Ceremony Performed at the Home of George Mehl, When Daughter it Was Became the Wife of George Schlereth.

One of the prettiest home weddings of the season was solemnized last week Wednesday when Miss Elizabeth Mehl, daughter of George Mehl, of West Second street, and George Schlereth, of Chatham street, were united in marriage by the Rev. J. O. McKelvey pastor of Warren Chapel. The decorations in the parlor consisted chiefly of roses and binks, in a beautiful variety.

The bride was handsomely gowned in boude cloth of a plum color, which was trimmed with chiffon, and she carried a bouquet of bridal roses.

Miss Carrie Mehl, sister of the bride, was bridemaid, and was gowned in blue ladies' cloth, trimmed with white lace and gilt braid.

Robert W. Schlereth, brother of the groom, acted as best man.

A shower of congratulations followed the ceremony, after which a wedding supper was served.

A costly and useful collection of presents was received by the happy couple from their many friends. During the reception which followed the ceremony several pleasing selections were rendered by the Eclipse Quartette! the members of which are intimate friends of the bride and groom.

Those present at the wedding were: Otto Schlereth and family, of Jersey City; Mr. and Mrs. Primer, of Hoboken; J. W. Mehl, of Hoboken; Mrs. Schlereth, George Mehl, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. F. Dieble, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Glaentzer, Mrs. Andrew Zeisz, Mrs. Elizabeth Zeisz and daughters, Miss Lillie Coussen, Miss Lillie Laing, George Zeisz and Harry Kesselring.

THEATRICAL.

"That "Brian Boru," now being produced at the Broadway Theatre, New York, by the Whitney Opera Company, is the best comic opera of the generation, is the unanimous opinion of the New York press. "Brian Boru" is just far enough above the average comic opera, with its silly horse play and inane buffoonery, and near enough to a stately grand opera, to appeal to the average man and the cultured taste. It is not necessary either to enjoy the opera thoroughly, that the auditor be an Irishman, even though the Irish flag is much in evidence. It is an attractive and sprighly production, elegantly mounted, with a cast of splendid capabilities. Mr. Whitney has again shown his ability to choose the right people for the proper and finished presentation of a light opera. His new production surpasses his other success, "Rob Roy." O'Connor's song, "The Irish Patriot," with the grand marches, ensembles and finales, make a combination that incites the most enthusiasm. Miss Amanda Fabris, stately and handsome, is the most important figure in light opera today. Max Eugene is a stately "Brian." Miss Amelia Summerville, Richard Carroll, John C. Slavin and Tom Ricketts are exceedingly amusing. Miss Grace Golden has improved in voice, and is an important member of an extraordinary cast. Here are some of the things that the New York press has said of "Brian Boru": Herald—"Had it been written in Italy, all New York would have been waiting for it at the Metropolitan. It may safely be classed among the greatest successes of the season." Sun—"A popular success." Evening World—"The production of 'Brian Boru' is the most important event of recent operatic history in New York."

There is a great diversity of offerings at the Pleasure Palace, New York, the only continious music hall in America. Sybil Johnstone, a well known legitimate actress, assisted by Shea, as leading man, "Lyon Adams," in "A Woman's Pay," a comedy which Coquelin and Augustus Boody gave jointly as a benefit. The European eccentrics, Brothers Puluski, in their funny skit, "Late on Parade," and Imro Fox, comedy juggling. John Wilson and Bertha Waring, of "Little Christopher" fame, (their vaudeville debut) in their famous talking and dancing sketch. Other high-class entertainers are the Casino Comedy Four; George Evans, the original "Honey Boy;" Stewart and Gillen, comedy boxers; Leavitte and Novello, jugglers; Minnie Lee and Corbett Conner, comediennes; the Carmon Sisters, duettists; Hanley, Logan and Hanley, comedy trio, and the Kariams, aerial gymnasts.

WATER FLOW LESSENED.

A SUIT FOR $10,000 TO BE STARTED BY A MILL OWNER.

Alleged That the Summit Water Company Have Diverted Green Brook's Volume of Water to the Damage of Others.

A very important suit for $10,000 is soon to be started that will involve one of the leading corporations of the town of Summit, the Summit Water Company, and make an intricate question for the courts to settle. The company, it is claimed, has been diverting the course of a number of small streams which have heretofore finally emptied into Greenbrook. The alleged result of this is that Greenbrook has been reduced in size and that the mill rights along this stream have been lessened in value on account of the decreased amount of water to give them power.

T. J Goth, of Dunellen, who owns the mill right at the old Goth mill between Dunellen and Greenbrook, claims that the lack of water has seriously injured the value of his property and is now preparing to bring a suit for $10,000.

The cause of the diverting of the streams was the need of more water to supply Summit and the course of the brooks has been changed so as to allow them to empty into the company's reservoir.

Mr Goth has retained City Judge DeMeza as his lawyer in the matter and the necessary papers are now being drawn. It is understood that the other mill owners on the course of the brook are behind Mr. Goth in this matter and will also push their claims should this one be successful.

Judge DeMeza was seen by a Press reporter last afternoon and admitted that the papers were being prepared in the case. The suit promises to be an interesting one.

During the past year many conferences have been held by the mill owners along Green brook from Scotch Plains to below Dunellen, and the question was discussed and many plans for united action suggested. F. M. French and Abram Cadmus, of this city, are both interested, as they both own mill rights on Green brook.

VOTE OF 1878 COMPARED WITH 1896.

Mr. Fisk Did Not Get Largest Majority Ever Given a Mayor.

There has been considerable discussion as to whether Mr. Fisk received the largest plurality in Tuesday's city election ever given to a Plainfield Mayor, when there was another candidate in the field. It was supposed that Mr. Fisk's plurality was the largest until the files of a newspaper were searched and that a larger plurality was discovered for the year 1878. In the charter election of that year there were three candidates for Mayor in the race, and the vote for them was as follows: Nathan Harper, Democrat, 760; Edward L. Morris, Republican, 347; Dr. George P. Carman, Independent, 51. Harper's plurality was 413, against Fisk's 370, and Harper's majority 362 against Fisk's 334. That, however, seems to be the only case where Mr. Fisk's plurality was exceeded by any previous candidate.

A Superbly Appointed Train.

Undoubtedly the handsomest train between Chicago and St. Paul, Minneapolis, the Superiors and Duluth, is the "North-Western Limited," which leaves Chicago at 6:30 p. m. daily, via. the North-Western Line (Chicago & North-Western R'y). Its equipment, which is entirely new throughout, and embraces Compartment Sleeping Cars, Buffet, Smoking and Library Cars, standard Sleeping Cars and Ladies Coaches, has every luxury which imagination can conceive or mind invent for the convenience of passengers. All agents sell tickets via the Chicago & North-Western R'y. For full information apply to agents of connecting line, or address W. B. Kniskern, G. P. and T. A., Chicago, Ill. 12 3 17.

DON'T BUTCHER US, PLEASE.

If Editor Runyon possesses such an irresistible inclination to roast us each and every day in his personal column, we beseech him to do it in more style and grace than has marked his acts of recent dates. We don't mind the complimentary passages a bit, so far as their animus or effect is concerned, but what we do deplore is the awful crudity, yea denseness, that the fine hand of a real newspaper man does not betray. We regret this because in a measure his coarse embryo hippodrome performances with the pen must necessarily lower the average of an honorable profession into which he has forced himself to buzz and profit, like the drone in the beehive, upon the work and ability of others, and in such deterioration we must share with the rest of our profession. "Tis hard, 'tis pitiable, 'tis unfortunate to be thus cast by the fates so near the swine. If Editor Runyon is perverse in his intention to make us a daily feature of his personal remarks, we ask (and it is not often that we ask favors of him, and if he has one whit of magnanimity in his character he will grant it) that he will write with more elegance and more humor about our faults and errors, which are to be but human. We don't mind the roasting, but we do hate this butchery. Perhaps Editor Runyon is not aware of the fact that he is not telling stories to the capricious college boys at Ithaca, but is writing for the edification and enjoyment of a respected and intelligent community.

One of the fascinations that newspaper work has for Editor Runyon, the drone of journalism, is the "roasting" of lively competitors in a vulgar and deformed tone, seeking to expose their passing errors in such a way as to cast the light of infallibility upon his own illustrous brow. He knows unless his sense of comprehension is very dense, and his acts at times disclose such a deplorable mental degeneracy that the haste in which a daily paper is prepared must necessarily invoke more or less mistakes, his own product being even more prolific in such faults than other contemporaries. Notwithstanding this, and in direct contravention of the commonest dictates of logic in determining just or sound conclusions of mental reason, he frequently refers, with a glamour of coarse adjectives and epithets, to the things in which soonest we are imperfect (because it is human to err) only to commit the same and even more egregious faults himself the very next moment.

The New Jersey Court of Errors has rendered an opinion setting aside as unconstitutional a law forbidding limited divorces to those who have religious scruples against the divorce. The court holds that this is an improper classification upon which to base a law. The law was passed principally for the benefit of Catholics, who are opposed to divorces, but who wanted a statute whereby their property rights might be maintained in case of separation.

That the course of true love never runs smooth is evidenced in the case of the ardent swain of this city who waited on an Elizabeth belle and playfully took a pound of butter from the fair damsel, and was then called to a court on the charge of theft. Explanations on the part of the rash admirer that he did it to tease the young lady finally exonerated him from his act.

Vice-President-elect Garrett A. Hobart gave a dinner at his home, in Paterson, yesterday afternoon to the members of the New Jersey Republican State Committee. The centrepiece was an elaborate floral elephant, representing the G. O. P., bearing Mckinley and Hobart to the White House.

Many taxpayers whose means are limited are wondering how the sewer assessments will be paid—whether in a lump sum or in payments that will be easy for those whose finances are small.

A Newark man who had been a football player recently had his neck dislocated by a trolley car. He survived, of course, and got $18,000 from the company.

Now that it is known that Mr. Fisk is to be Mayor, a good deal of speculation is going on as to what course he will pursue in making appointments.

A dinner is being arranged by the Republican leaders in honor of Mayor Gilbet, who is to retire in favor of Councilman Fisk the first of January.

shall constitute a special fund to be used according to the discretion of the State Board of Education for the encouragement of secondary and kindergarten schools, thus enabling it to piece out and complete a public school system that is at the present time deficient at both ends. If the said Board shall elect to use less for this purpose than the sum thus raised and set apart, then the balance to be annually apportioned the same as other school moneys.

"I sincerely hope that the above suggestion will be given due consideration, and as a result of such consideration receive early and favorable legislative action."

GOV. GRIGGS HESITATES.

Gov. Griggs says he has not yet made up his mind about the advisability of sending the New Jersey National Guard to Washington to take part in the inaugural parade. He hesitates over approving it because of the expense it would incur. A conservative estimate of the cost of transportation and rations for two days for the entire division places the figures at $25,000, without pay for the men.

A few days ago the Elizabeth Journal made a great ado about how much greater their sportsmen are than those of Plainfield, and boasted that in all games they were the superiors. We of Plainfield are modest in our claims, but still we think that in several pastimes, notably bowling and whist, we can knock the spots of the Elizabeth crack a jacks.

Now that it really looks as though Plainfield may be graced with a modern building, adapted to needs, for a city hall, the question of a site is a very important one and is being carefully considered. Among the properties mentioned is that owned by J. Fred MacDonald at the corner of East Front street and Watchung avenue.

Chief Doane tells The Press that no blame whatever can be thrown on Driver Fred Breem for the deplorable accident in the fire department Sunday morning. The Chief commends Driver Breem as one of the best handlers of the reins over a team of horses that he has ever seen.

Beyond the honor which Plainfield accorded to Rev. John Watson last night by packing Music Hall with the city's distinguished people to hear his lecture, is also the gratification of knowing that the profits are to go to one of the most worthy institutions of the city—the Children's Home.

Romantic and daredevilish, indeed, is the story printed in The Press today of the capture of the two boy bandits who looted a Plainfield home of a cool thousand. But they will pay the fiddler, no doubt, when brought before the judicial bench.

It is said that the reason Senator Smith was appointed a member of the committee to notify President Cleveland that Congress had assembled, was because Mr. Cleveland is soon to become a Jerseyman.

As an aftermath of the recent State convention of the Christian Endeavor in this city, the week of prayer being observed this week is very appropriate.

A Noble Woman Gone.

A telegram was received Monday announcing the sudden death at 7 o'clock that morning of Miss A. C. Bagot, at the home of her sister, Mrs. E. J. Howard, Wilmington, N. C. Miss Bagot spent all of last winter at the home of her cousin, Mrs. A. L. Force, 82 Duer street, and that home was truly made brighter by her presence. None knew her but to love her, and her sudden death will sadden many hearts in Plainfield and very many in Brooklyn, where she has resided all her life. But blessed be God, she is among the redeemed in Heaven, having given her heart to Christ early in life.

Her remains were brought to Brooklyn on Tuesday afternoon and taken to her former home, 119 Schermerhorn street, and on Wednesday afternoon the funeral services were held at Plymouth church, her church home, where friends and relatives were permitted to gaze for the last time on earth at the face of her who had so suddenly been called from earth to Heaven. Beautiful flowers, in great profusion, covered the casket and were banked around it. Interment was made in Greenwood cemetery.

To Kill Thistles

It is not necessary to kill all the seeds of the thistles in order to exterminate these undesirable weeds. You can so cultivate the ground that they will not thrive; and at last will disappear altogether. It might be better to kill the seeds, but we cannot do it. It would be the wisest course to destroy all the germs, or seeds, of consumption, could we do so. But this cannot be done. So we must keep the tissues of the lungs, the soil, in such a condition that the germs will not thrive the

REV. C. E. HERRING PREACHES ON THE ARMENIAN QUESTION.

He Thinks It is Time For a Christian and Just Nation Like This to Intercede for Oppressed Armenia.

The following is a portion of the sermon preached by Rev. C. E. Herring last Sunday on the "Armenian Question."

"Acts 8-1 'And Saul was consenting to his death!' That was to the death of the Godly man Stephen—and he is classed with the persecutors. We may regard these two characters as personifications of the Christian nations of the world and Armenia. The Armenian question continues to absorb our interest, and seems to be no nearer solution. Foxes' Book of Martyrs is outclassed by the barbarities of this enlightened Christian nineteenth century. The cruelties of the Roman Colosseum were humane in comparison. The historic Diocletian persecution numbered but 2000; this, 100,000 victims, and yet this frightful loss of life by a semi-barbarous people is only met with political apathy.

The Armenians—who are they? The first nation to accept Christianity; men capable, energetic and peaceable, in all respects our equals, eager for education according to Dr. Hamlin, "a noble race" that cling to their faith under eleven centuries of persecution under the Berlin Treaty, the Sultan engaged to maintain religious liberty, and he has failed. Armenians, revolutionists! How many Turks killed? How many Armenians? Oh, for another Knox with a revised edition of the lamb and the wolf. The Turk was a brigand at his entrance into Europe and is a brigand today. Armenian atrocity is no new thing.

"It is time for America to take vigorous action. Losses to Americans amount to $100,000. What reparation has been made? Nothing, and nothing will be made under the present Minister.

"The United States has a grievance and no territory to acquire, and she should possess a little of the American spirit of 1815. When the hands of England were tied she swept the Mediterranean of the Algerian pirates. Here is another time when she can act. Let her speak in such a tone that will thunder at the gate of the Sultan's palace and create such an impression that the American flag shall be respected."

W. W. Pierson, of Liberty street, is confined at his home by illness.

VEHICLES LIKE SIEVES.

THEY CAUSE UNTOLD TROUBLES TO BICYCLISTS BY PUNCTURING TIRES.

Street Commissioner Meeker is Making Every Effort to Prevent the Scattering of Refuse by Ash Carts and Stone Wagons.

Plainfield has had excellent roads during the past year but a visit to the repair shops for bicycles in the city would have shown an unusual number of punctured tires. Of course, a certain number is to be expected but the number was larger than it should have been. Early in the summer, the new crushed stone used in repairing the macadamized roads accounted for much of it but the many rains converted the lime in the stone into a cement.

One of the prominent factors in the puncturing of the tires is the fine crushed stone that is allowed to fall from many of the stone wagons that pass through the streets. Some of these wagons are old and the cracks between the boards are large enough to allow a small stream of the fine sharp particles of stone to sprinkle all over the roadway. Street Commissioner Meeker is a cyclist and appreciates the danger to wheels and to horses' hoofs from these sharp stones, and has often warned the owners of the leaky wagons that they must be more careful.

Another unthankful duty of Mr. Meeker's is in trying to keep the local ash collectors from dropping the contents of their wagons all over the streets. The sharp ashes, bits of broken glass, and tacks and nails are as dangerous to the cyclists as the small stones, while newspapers, boxes and the like give the streets a very untidy appearance. Many times has Mr. Meeker called down the maledictions of the drivers of these vehicles on his head by making them go back and sweep up their remains of a broken bottle or pick up some large piece of paper that has blown off their load. Mr. Meeker can't be everywhere at once and so these things gradually gather to the discomfort of the wheelmen, as many will testify.

There has been some talk of incorporating in one of the next ordinances a law that will in some way prevent this wholesale distribution of the loads of the ash and stone wagons along the thoroughfares of the city. The plan suggested in the case of the ash wagons was that before they were licensed that the wagons should be inspected by the street commissioner as to whether they were in condition to carry their loads of ashes and other rubbish. Some action would be well received by the cycling population of Plainfield and North Plainfield.

NEW YORK TRIBUNE

Recognized as a Great, Safe, Clean Family Paper—A Force in Public Affairs and Potent for Entertainment and Culture of Every Member of the Family.

Colored Supplement with the Semi-Weekly.

There is a place in the United States for a weekly of really high intellectual quality, and the SEMI-WEEKLY TRIBUNE has given the NEW YORK TRIBUNE a large clientage. During the past year THE WEEKLY was taken in over 240,000 families and read by about 1,200,000 people. Every effort will be made to brighten and enrich the paper and make it welcome to thousands of new friends.

Particular attention, entering, THE TRIBUNE is fearless and a polarity in editorial comment on public affairs, steadfast in principle, and not afraid about with every gust of passion; and it exhibits in every issue the true American qualities of quickness, directness, brilliancy and force. It has won from Democratic readers by its thoroughly American spirit, the admission that it "commands the respect of all parties." Continued, ing attention early and resolutely to the availability of McKinley and Hobart for the Republican nomination in 1896, THE TRIBUNE played a now well known and important part.

THE WEEKLY TRIBUNE ministers to all the sweet and wholesome interests of life, and it is distinctly a paper for families and for those who like the spirit and the editorials of the leading Republican paper of the United States. It has an excellent Agricultural page in charge of Solon Robinson, a charming page especially for women, a strong array of market reports of unchallenged excellence, and book reviews, foreign letters, and bright miscellany, in addition to the news of the week.

It can usually be subscribed for with local county weeklies. Sample copies free.

THE SEMI-WEEKLY is printed on Tuesday and Friday, and gives twice as much matter as The Weekly.

The craving for color on the part of the young, and even of other members of the family, has now been recognized by THE SEMI-WEEKLY TRIBUNE in the publication of a colored supplement of 16 pages, with each Friday's paper. If not gratified in a proper way these pictures and innocent bright reading matter will undoubtedly be sought in less desirable publications that which they contain. There will be stories, jokes and quaint paragraphs, and the very cream of colored humor. Original pen sketches and half tones, and many other amusing contents of the colored supplement will prove a welcome addition to the valuable reading parts of the paper. It is printed on superfine paper, and its 16 pages are themselves fully worth the price of the paper. The colored supplement is a pictorial weekly. "Winkles" readily detaches from the paper, and in the course of a year the reader would receive more than he has paid for the TRIBUNE free. The unique complexities of the supplement will lend new value to bound volumes and make a cab copy a valuable long after the date of publication.

The edition is not offered in combination with local weeklies. The colored supplement will be sent only to subscribers, who forward the regular price of the SEMI-WEEKLY, $2.00 a year, to THE TRIBUNE, New York.

Sample copies of Friday's SEMI-WEEKLY free.

The Sofa Caught Fire.

A fire occurred at the home of Horace Sherwin, on Orchard place, last Sunday, in a most peculiar manner. Mr. Sherwin was sitting in the parlor and while lighting a cigar, a spark from the match struck the sofa. In an instant the sofa was one mass of flames. Mr. Sherwin's first thought was to get the piece of furniture outdoors, which he did. In the meantime Lawrence Bernet, a young son of Jacob Benner, saw the flames and he ran to the corner of Front and Grove streets where he sent in an alarm from Box 31, with the key from Barker's drug store. The department responded quickly, but the firemen had very little to do, except to extinguish the flames of the burning sofa which was by that time out in the street. The loss was $02.

The old lady was right when she said the child might die if they waited for the doctor. She saved the little one's life with a few doses of One Minute Cough Cure. She had used it for croup before. L. W. Randolph, 143 West Front street.

—The sidewalk in front of H. S. Spencer's place of business on Somerset street, is being repaired.

—The Methodist watch-night service will be held this year in the Vincent chapel. The Monroe Avenue and Grace M. E. churches will join with the First M. E church.

THE RUNAWAYS RETURN

CHIEF GRANT ESCORTED THEM HOME FROM WASHINGTON.

There Was a Large Crowd Awaiting Them —The Lads Have Little to Say and Refused to Make a Statement in Court.

After two weeks of gay life at the capital of the country, Lewis Milligan and Charles Wilson have returned to their native city, but in a far different way than in which they left it. After enjoying all that money could buy, they finally wound up in a cell of the Plainfield lockup, a tired, sorrowful pair of lads for they have begun to realize their position.

The story of their disappearance was exclusively told in The Press at the time, Monday their capture at Washington was recorded. Chief Grant went to Washington after them Monday morning and found the lads all safe in the charge of the Washington police. The Chief took a look at the Capitol while he was there, and then started for home with his two prisoners handcuffed at his side. The fact leaked out that the chief and his prisoners were expected to arrive on the 9:55 train, and when they reached here they found half the juvenile population of the town awaiting them. Stories of the wonderful adventures of the two Plainfield lads had gone abroad and everybody wanted to see them.

Both lads were looking well and dressed right up to date. Milligan wore a suit of dark cloth and a tan and white "turtle-back" sweater. His companion had on a well-fitting suit of brown cloth, a white shirt with figured bosom and figured silk neck-tie. He also wore a brown overcoat of light weight and a white Fedora hat. Milligan had a black Fedora hat and both lads wore pointed russet shoes. Their luggage arrived Tuesday morning by express and consisted of a trunk, a grip, one valise, three suit cases and a Stearns road wheel, gorgeous in its yellow enamel.

They were lodged in the lockup for the night. Tuesday they refused to eat anything although they had fasted since Monday morning. They were not much inclined to talk to their visitors, but told some of their experiences.

Their story, as learned by Chief Grant on his visit to Washington, was that the lads arrived there about two weeks ago and put up at the Keystone Hotel. There they took several rooms, one of which was partially equipped as a gymnasium. They purchased two wheels and bicycle suits and enjoyed Washington's famous asphalt roads. They became acquainted with two of Washington's fair daughters, both of respected families. The lads bought four gold watches with accompanying chains, two of which were afterwards found in the possession of the girls who had, however, no idea of where the money came from. Four solitaire diamonds rings, two of which were presented to their young lady friends, were also found and two pearl studded rings. The young men equipped themselves with what they thought necessary and enjoyed life.

At last they went to the races where they were finally discovered by the detectives, as was told last evening in The Press. Milligan says that they bet $10 on a horse and won $25 just before they were discovered.

When captured they had about $340 in cash, the jewelry already mentioned, one wheel, the other had been sold, and their trunk, grips and dress-suit cases. The certificates of deposit had been destroyed.

The lads were brought before Justice Newcorn Tuesday morning at 11 o'clock for a hearing. Through their counsel, they pleaded non vult and refused to make a statement. City Judge DeMeza acted as their attorney. Justice Newcorn then committed them to the county jail to await the action of the grand jury.

A FIRE HORSE KILLED.

DRIVER BREEM GOT INTO A BAD MESS IN A RUN TO A FIRE.

Made a Turn, and to Avoid Colliding With Gazelle's Cart, Ran Into a Tree and Killed the Horse and Hurt Himself.

The most expensive fire to the Plainfield fire department occured Sunday morning at 12:21 when an alarm was sent in from Box 21, corner of Watchung and North avenues, by Patrolman Saunders. The fire was in the servants' room of the house at 893 Richmond street, occupied by Samuel E. Brooks and family. The colored servant girl was in her room, and she was sitting on her bed doing some sewing. Close by the bed was a chair on which stood the lighted lamp. In a few minutes the woman dropped off to sleep and while in this condition she accidentally knocked the lamp over. She awoke just in time, for soon afterward the lamp exploded. The woman ran out of the room and called Mr. Brooks who was on the first floor getting ready to retire. The two used what water was handy, but Mr. Brooks soon learned that he could not extinguish the fire. He then ran out doors and searched for a patrolman. Not finding one he returned for his wheel and came up town, where he found Patrolman Saunders. He wanted the latter to send in an alarm from Box 25, but this he could not do, as it was off of his beat, so he used Box 21.

The chemical engine appeared first and the patrolman informed Driver Fiering where the fire was. Very quickly he reached the house and with the aid of a man, named Godown, run the line of hose to the top floor. The room was dense with smoke and after two attempts he succeeded in entering the room. Fiering was, however, obliged to lay flat on the floor, over his face with his hat, and use the hose with one hand. He bravely fought the fire until the other firemen arrived. Perhaps at no other time has the chemical engine proved its efficiency to such good advantage, for the house would probably have been consumed. As it was, the fire was confined entirely to the one room.

While all of the above was going on, one of the most serious accidents in the history of the department occurred.

Driver Fred Breem, with the hook and ladder truck, and Driver James Daly, with Gazelle hose carriage, met at the corner of Watchung and North avenues. Someone called to Daly to go to Fifth street, while someone else told Breem to go straight ahead. Daly took the lead and the apparatus went down Watchung avenue flying.

When near Fifth street it is said that it looked to Breem as though Daly was going to turn into Fifth street to the left. This did not evidently appear to the former quick enough, for he soon learned that he either had to run into the hose wagon with the possibility of killing several men or make an exceedingly short turn into East Fifth street. He chose the latter and did not have room enough to clear himself. The next instant there was a terrific crash, for the horse known as George had run into a big tree and broken his back. The foot board of the truck also hit the tree with such force as to twist it all out of shape and break the gong, besides causing a bad sprain of Breems's right leg. F. S. Moore, who was at the wheel was thrown completely over the wheel and his hat was demolished. The front wheel next to the curb was thrown out of shape, every spoke was cracked and the arm of the axle was bent.

A crowd soon gathered and Dr. Pocock was sent for to examine the condition of the horse. Soon after the accident Chief Doane appeared and upon learning that none of his men were fatally injured, he went on to the scene of the fire. When the doctor arrived he ascertained upon examination that the horse was mortally wounded, and acting under orders, Patrolman Flanagan shot the animal and put him out of misery.

Breem remained with the other horse, who was not injured in the least, while the firemen pulled the truck by hand to the fire.

Later, when it was learned that Breem was injured, Chief Doane took him to Dr. Long's house and had him examined. The doctor pronounced it a very bad sprain. After proper treatment Breem was taken home, where he will be confined for some time. That he was not killed is a mystery.

Councilman C. J. Fisk was notified at once and he, together with Chief Doane, made a thorough investigation of the affair. They decided that the accident was the result of circumstances which could not have been avoided, and they attach the blame to no one. Mr. Fisk was consulted, because Councilman Stebbins, chairman of the fire committee, was out of town and Mr. Fisk was the most easy one to reach.

One of Wm. Hand's horses was at once secured and will be kept until other arrangements are made. Frank Hand is on duty as driver.

The truck will be repaired at once, and the old truck will be used in its place.

The fire consumed everything in the room, which articles belonged to the servant and upon which there was no insurance. No other part of the house was damaged nor was anything else burned.

FROM O'ER BONNIE LEE

one which you all recognize, for you call us the "Canny Scot." If you want to understand any people, you must look at their past history. The Scotch nation had for centuries to stand sword in hand, constantly on guard. And now the Scotch are ever engaged in watching, in playing an endless game of fence. Notice how guarded the Scot is, he will grant nothing. You say you can get nothing out of a Scot; well, we know that there is nothing in which a man needs to be more careful than in his choice of words, and often afore we choose exactly the right word to use, the occasion for using it is gone. Conversation with us, you perceive, is on an intellectual basis. In what other country can you see the peasants sitting hour after hour arguing some theological proposition?

Another trait is dourness. The difference between dourness and obstinacy is that one dour Scot more than equals a thousand merely obstinate men.

There have been very few martyrs in Scotland, in times of religious persecut on. If there are to be persecutions, there are two who can play at that game. The persecutors usually lose their interest in that sort of thing when the friends of the martyr manifest an inclination to send his persecutor after him. You can't intimidate a Scot; if you say to him: "We'll make it the worse for you if you do such a thing," he stands up all the straighter as he says: "Well, I'll do it!"

You can't bully the Scottish nation. They will stand up for their rights, and they have never been beaten. If you take them the other way, you will find them yielding enough. They are the hardest people in the world, if a man threatens them; they are the softest people in the world, if a man coaxes and compliments them. It is of men who stand fast for what their conscience tells them, out of which you may build up a strong nation, a nation which will stand fast in the hour of trial.

Scattered through Mr. Watson's lecture were many stories of Scotch life, illustrating the traits he was describing, and told in his inimitable style. At the close of the lecture he gave a reading from "Through the Flood," one of the stories contained in "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush," telling how the rugged old country doctor, Wellum MacLure, brought the great city surgeon to save the life of Annie, Tammas Mitchell's beloved wife, by the operation which he alone could perform. The touching little story has gone to the hearts and brought tears to the eyes of many, when read at home, but the scene became real before them as never before as they listened to it told by the pleasant, sympathetic voice, which brought out both the firmness and the strength and the exceeding tenderness of the grand old "doctor of the old school."

As a Plainfield clergyman recently said in his sermon, Ian Maclaren's religious books may die, since they are not espe ially remarkable, but the world will not soon forget his stories of Scottish life, which came straight from his great warm heart, and go straight to the hearts of his readers.

THE MISTRESS of the Mine.

A Woman Intervenes.

exaggerated, Miss Brewster had a time to tone it down. Picturesque and dramatic description was what she aimed at. Her pen flew over the paper with great rapidity, and she looked up every now and then, through her study room window, to see dangling from the ropes the boat that was to make the attempt to reach the Irish coast. As she could thus see how the preparations for the departure were going forward, she lingered longer than she might otherwise have done, and added line after line to the dispatch which told of the disaster. At last she saw the men take their places in the long boat. She hurriedly counted the words in the new dispatch she had written, and quickly from her purse piled the gold that was necessary to pay for their transmission. Then she sealed the two dispatches in an envelope, put the two piles of gold into one, after rapidly counting them again, cast a quick look up at the still motionless boat, grasped the gold in one hand, the envelope in the other, and sprang to her feet; but as she did so she gave a shriek and took a step backward.

"Stand aside! I have no time to talk with you."

Standing with her back to the door was Edith Longworth. When she had entered the stateroom Miss Brewster did not know, but her heart beat wildly as she saw the girl standing silently there, as if she had risen up through the floor.

"What are you doing here?" she demanded.

"I am here," said Miss Longworth, "because I wish to talk with you."

"Stand aside; I have no time to talk with you just now. I told you I didn't want to see you again. Stand aside, I tell you."

"I shall not stand aside."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that I shall not stand aside.' Then I shall ring the bell and have you thrust out of here for your impudence."

"You shall not ring the bell," said Edith calmly, putting her hand over the white china arrangement that held in its center the black electric button.

"Do you mean to tell me that you intend to keep me from leaving my own stateroom?"

"I mean to tell you exactly that."

"Do you know that you can be imprisoned for attempting such a thing?"

"I don't care."

"Stand aside, you vixen, or I will strike you."

"Do it."

For a moment the two girls stood there, the one flushed and excited, the other apparently calm, with her back against the door and her hand over the electric button. A glance through the window showed Miss Brewster that the mate had got into the boat, and that they were steadily lowering away.

"Let me pass, you—you wretch!"

"All in good time," replied Edith Longworth, whose gaze was also upon the boat swinging in midair. Jenny Brewster was at once glad that it came to a hand-to-hand encounter she would have no chance whatever against the English girl, who was in every way her physical superior. She had her envelope in one hand and the gold in the other. She thrust both of them into her pocket, which, after some fumbling, she found. Then she raised her voice in one of the most appalling screams Edith Longworth had ever heard. As if in answer to the ear-piercing scream, there arose from the steamer a loud and ringing cheer. Both glanced up to see where the boat was, but it was not in sight. Several ropes were dangling down past the portholes. Miss Brewster sprang up on the sofa, and with her small hands turned round the screw which held the deadlight closed.

Edith Longworth looked at her without making any attempt to prevent the unfastening of the window.

Jennie Brewster flung open the heavy brass circle which held the thick green glass, and again she screamed at the top of her voice, crying "Help!" and "Murder!"

The other did not move from her position. In the silence that followed the steady splash of oars could be heard, and again a muskego cheer rang out from those who were left upon the motionless steamer. Edith Longworth raised herself on tiptoe and looked out of the open window. On the crest of a wave, 500 yards away from the vessel, she saw the boat for a moment appear, showing the white glitter of her six dripping oars; then it vanished down the other side of the wave into the trough of the sea.

"Now, Miss Brewster, you are at liberty to go."

CHAPTER X.

After Edith Longworth left her female Brewster indulged in a few paroxysms of hysterics. Her good sense, however, speedily got her out of that, and as she became more or less calm she began to wonder why she had not assaulted the girl who had dared to imprison her. She dimly remembered that she thought of a fierce onslaught at the time, and she also remembered that the fear of the boat leaving during the row had stayed her hand. But now that the boat had left, she bitterly regretted her inaction, and grieved unavailingly over the fact that she had stopped to write the account of the disaster which befell the Caloric. Had she not done so she might have been well, but her great ambition to be counted the best newspaper woman in New York, and to show the editor that she was equal to any emergency that might arise, had unfitted her. While it would have been possible for her to send away one telegram, her desire to write the second had resulted in her sending none at all. Although she impugned her own conduct in language that one would not have expected to have heard from the lips of a daughter of a millionaire, her anger against Edith Longworth became more intense, and a fierce desire to have revenge took possession of the fair correspondent. She resolved that she would go up on deck and shame this woman before everybody. She would attract public attention to the affair by tearing Edith Longworth from her deck chair, and in her present state of mind she had no doubt she had the strength to do it. With the yearning for revenge fierce and strong upon her, the newspaper woman put on her hat and departed for the deck. Like an enraged tigress she passed up one side and down the other, but her would-be victim was not visible. The rage of Miss Brewster increased when she found her prey was not there when required. She had a fear that when she calmed down her own good sense would assert itself, and her revenge would be lost. In going to and fro along the deck she met Kenyon and Fleming walking together. Fleming had just that moment come up to Kenyon, who was moodily pacing the deck alone, and, slapping him on the shoulder, asked him to have a drink.

"It seems to me," he said, "that I never have had the pleasure of offering you a drink since we came on board the ship. I want to drink with everybody who is here, and especially now, when something has happened to make it worth while."

"I am very much obliged to you," said John Kenyon, coldly, "but I never drink with anybody."

"What, never touch it at all? Not even ale?"

"Not even ale."

"Well, I am astonished to hear that. I thought every Englishman drank ale."

"There is at least one Englishman who does not."

"All right, then, no harm done, and no offense given, I hope. I may say, however, that you miss a lot of fun in this world."

"I presume I miss a few headaches also."

"Oh, not necessarily. I have one great recipe for not having a headache. You see, this is the philosophy of headaches," and then, much to John's chagrin, he linked arms with him and thereupon he walked Kenyon's walking all the time as if they were the most intimate friends in the world.

"I have a sure plan for avoiding a headache. You see, when you look into the matter, it is this way. The headache only comes when you are sober. Very well, then. It is as simple as A B C. Never get sober; that's the way I do. I simply keep on and never get sober, so I have no headaches. If people who drink would avoid the disagreeable necessity of ever getting sober, they would be all right. Don't you see what I mean?"

"And now about their brains in the mean time?"

"Oh, their brains are all right. Good liquor sharpens a man's brains wonderfully. Now you try it some time. Let me have them mix a cocktail for you. I tell you, John, a cocktail is one of the finest drinks that ever was made, and when a man was, when I myself was on board, he thought he could make a cocktail, but he didn't know even the rudiments. I have taught him how to do it, and I tell you that secret will be worth a fortune to him, because there is nothing Americans like it is to have their cocktails mixed correctly. There's no one man in all England can do it, and very few men on the Atlantic service. But I'm gradually educating them. Seven years ago, when they pretended to give you American drinks over in England, but you must know how disappointing they are."

"I'm sure I don't see how I should know, for I never drank any of them."

"Ah, true; I had forgotten that. Well I took this barkeeper here in hand, and he knows now how to make a reasonably good cocktail; and, as I say, that secret will be worth money to him from American passengers."

John Kenyon was revolving in his mind the problem of how to get rid of this loquacious and generous individual when he saw, sailing down upon them, the irate figure of Miss Jennie Brewster, and he wondered if she was the cause of the look of bitter indignation flashing from her eyes. He thought that she intended to address the American politician, but he was mistaken. She came directly at him, and, with her fist clenched, said in a hoarse voice:

"Well, John Kenyon, what do you think of your work?"

"What work?" asked the bewildered man.

"You know very well what work I mean. A fine specimen of a man you are! Without the courage yourself to prevent my sending that telegram, you induced your dupe to come down to my stateroom and brazenly keep me from sending it."

The look of utter astonishment that came upon the face of honest John Kenyon would have convinced any woman in her senses that he knew nothing at all of what she was speaking. A wild idea of this, indeed, flashed across the young woman's heated brain. But before she could speak Fleming said:

"Tut, tut, my dear girl, you are talking too loud altogether. Do you want to attract the attention of everybody on the deck? You mustn't make a scandal in this way on board ship."

"Scandal!" she cried. "We will soon see whether there will be a scandal or not. Attract the attention of those on deck! That is exactly what I am going to do, until I show up the villainy of this man you are talking to. He was the concoctor of it, and he knows it. She never had brains enough to think of it. He was too much of a coward to carry it out himself, and so he set her to do his dastardly piece of work."

"Well, well," said Fleming, "even if he has done all that, whatever it is, it will do no good to attract the attention to it here publicly. Everybody is listening to what you are saying. My dear girl, you are too angry to talk just now; the best thing you can do is to go to your stateroom."

"You shut your silly mouth, will you?" she cried, turning furiously upon him. "I'll thank you to mind your own business, and let me attend to mine. I should have thought that you would have found out before this that I am capable of attending to my own affairs."

"Certainly, certainly, my dear girl," answered the politician, soothingly. "I'm sorry I can't tell you all to come and have a drink with me and talk the matter over quietly. That's the correct way to do things. Not to stand here screeching in the face of everybody listening. Now, if you will quietly discuss the matter with John here, I'm sure everything will be all right."

"You don't know what you are talking about," replied the young lady. "Do you know that I have an important dispatch to send to the Argus, and that this man's friend, doubtless at his instigation, came into my room and practically held me prisoner there until the boat had left, so that I could not send the dispatch? I think the cruel and villainy of that, and speak to me of talking wildly!"

A look of relief and astonishment came into Kenyon's face that quite convinced the newspaper woman, more than all the explanations would have done, that he knew nothing of the escapade whatever.

"And who kept you from coming out?" asked Fleming.

"It is none of your business," she replied, tartly.

"If you will believe me," said Kenyon, at last, "I knew nothing whatever of all this, so you see there is no use speaking to me about it. I won't pretend I am sorry, because I am not."

This added fuel to the flame, and she was about to blaze out again when Kenyon turned on his heel and left her and Fleming standing facing each other. Then the young woman herself turned and quickly departed, leaving the astonished politician utterly alone, so that there was nothing for him to do but to go into the smoking-room and ask somebody to have a drink with him, which he promptly did.

Miss Brewster made her way to the captain's room and rapped at the door. On being told to enter she found that officer seated at his table with some charts before him, and a haggard look upon his face, which might have warned her that this was not the proper time for any personal grievances.

"Well?" he said briefly as she entered.

"I came to see you, captain," she began, "because an outrageous thing has been done on board this ship, and I desire reparation—what is more, I will have it!"

"What is the outrageous thing?" asked the captain.

"I had some dispatches to send to New York for the New York Argus, on whose staff I am."

"Yes," said the captain, with interest; "dispatches relating to what has happened to the ship?"

"One of them did, the other did not."

"Well, I don't see," said the captain, "you have not given an exaggerated account of the condition we are in."

"I have given no account at all, simply because I was prevented from sending the cablegrams."

"Ah, indeed," said the captain, a look of relief coming over his face in spite of his efforts to conceal it, "and pray, what prevented you from sending your cablegrams? The mate would have taken any messages that were given to him."

"I know that," cried the young woman; "and when I was in my room writing the last of the dispatches, a person who is on board as a passenger there—that person burst—came into my room and held me prisoner there until the boat had left the ship."

The captain arched his eyebrows in astonishment.

"No, dear madam," he said, "you make a very serious charge. Miss Longworth has crossed several times with me, and I am bound to say that a more well-behaved young lady I never had on board my ship."

"Extremely well-behaved she is!" cried the correspondent angrily. "She stood against my door and prevented me from going out. I screamed for help, but my screams were drowned in the cheers of the passengers when the boat left."

"Why did you not ring your bell?"

"I couldn't ring my bell because she prevented me. Besides, if I had reached the bell, it is not likely anybody would have answered it; everybody seemed to be cheering after the boat that was leaving."

"You can hardly blame them for that. A great deal depends on the safety of that boat. In fact, if you come to think about it, you will see that whatever grievance you may have, it is, after all, a very trivial one compared to the burden that weighs on me just now, and I very much prefer not to have anything to do with disputes between the passengers until we are out of our present—"

"The predicament has nothing whatever to do with it. I tell you a fact. I tell you that one of your passengers came and imprisoned me in my state room. I come to you for redress. Now there must be some law on shipboard that takes the place of ordinary law on land. I make this demand officially to you. If you refuse to hear me, and refuse to redress my wrongs, then I have a large republic to which I can appeal through my paper, and perhaps there will also be a chance of obtaining justice through the law of the land to which I am going."

"My dear madam," said the captain, calmly, "you must not use threats to me. I am not accustomed to be talked to in the way you have taken upon yourself to speak. Now tell me what it is you wish me to do."

"It is for you to say what you will do. I am a passenger on board this ship, and am supposed to be under the protection of its captain. I therefore tell you I have been forcibly detained in my stateroom, and I demand that the person who did this shall be punished."

"You say that Miss Longworth was the person who did this?"

"Yes, I do."

"Now do you know you make a very serious charge against that young lady? A charge that I find it very difficult to believe. May I ask you what reason she had for doing what you say she has done?"

"That is a long story. I am quite prepared to show that she tried to bribe me not to send a dispatch, and, finding herself unsuccessful, she forcibly detained me in my room until too late to send the telegram."

The captain pondered over what had been said to him.

"Have you any proof of this charge?"

"Proof! What do you mean? Do you doubt my word?"

"I mean exactly what I say. Have you anything to prove the very serious charge you bring?"

"Certainly not. I have no proof. If there had been a witness there the thing would not have happened. If I could have called to help it would not have happened. How could I have any proof of such an outrage?"

"Well, do you not see that it is impossible for me to take action on your unsupported word? Do you not see that if you take further steps in this extraordinary affair, Miss Longworth will ask you for proof of what you state? If she denies acting as you say she did, and refers to prove your allegation, it seems to me that you will be in rather a bad predicament. You would be liable to a suit for slander. Just think the matter over calmly for the rest of the day before you take any further action upon it, and I would strongly advise you to mention this to nobody on board. Then, if to-morrow you are still in the same frame of mind, come to me."

Thus dismissed, the young woman left the captain's room, and met Mr. Fleming just outside, who said:

"Look here, Miss Brewster, I want to have a word with you. You were very curt with me just now."

"Mr. Fleming, I do not wish to speak to you."

"Oh, that's all right, that's all right; but let me tell you this: You're a pretty smart young woman, and you have done me one or two very evil turns in your life. I have found out all about this affair, and it's one of the funniest things I ever heard of."

"Very funny, isn't it?" snapped the young woman.

"Of course it's very funny; but when it appears in full in the opposition papers to the Argus, perhaps you won't see the humor of it, though everybody else in New York will, that's one consolation."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean to say, Jennie Brewster, that unless you are a fool you will drop this thing. Don't for heaven's sake let anybody know you were treated by an English girl in the way you were. Take my advice, and say no more about it."

"And what business is it of yours?"

"It isn't mine at all; that is why I am meddling with it. Aren't you well enough acquainted with me to know that nothing in the world pleases me so much as to interfere with other people's business? I have found out all about the girl who kept you in, and a mighty plucky action it was, too. I have seen that girl on the deck, and I like the cut of her jib. I like the way she walks. Her independence suits me. She is a girl who wouldn't give a man any trouble, now I tell you, if he were lucky enough to win her. And I am not going to see that girl put to any trouble by you, understand that?"

"Mr. Fleming, I do not wish to speak to you."

"And how are you going to prevent it, may I ask?"

"May you ask! Why, of course you may. I will tell you how I am going to prevent it. Simply by restraining you from doing another thing in the matter."

"If you think you can do that you are very much mistaken. I am going to have that girl put in prison, if there is a law in the land."

"Well, in the first place, we are not on land, and, in the second place, you are going to do nothing of the kind; because, if you do, I shall go to the London correspondents of the other New York papers and give the whole blessed snap away. I'll tell them how the smart and cute Miss Dolly Dimple, who has been so much in the limelight in her life, was once caught in her own trap; and I shall inform them how it took place. And they'll be glad to get it, you bet! It will make quite interesting reading in the New York opposition papers some Sunday morning—about a column and a half, say. Won't there be some swearing in the Argus when that appears? It won't be your losing the dispatch you were going to send, but it will be your utter idiocy in making the thing public, and letting the other papers onto it. Why, the best thing in the world for you to do, and the only thing, is to keep as quiet about it as possible. I am astonished at a girl of your pluck, Dolly, making a public fuss like this, when you should be the very one trying to keep it quiet."

The newspaper correspondent pondered on these words.

"And you'll keep quiet about it, will you do the same?"

"Certainly; but you must remember that if ever you attempt any of your tricks of interviewing on me again, out comes this whole thing, don't forget that."

"I won't," said Miss Jennie Brewster. And next morning, when the captain was anxiously awaiting her arrival in his room, she did not appear.

CHAPTER XI.

After all, it must be admitted that George Wentworth was a man of somewhat changeable character. For the last two or three days he had been moping around like one who meditated suicide; now he suddenly became the brightest individual aboard, when every one else was wondering what was going to happen to the ship. For a man to be moody and distraught while danger was impending was not at all surprising; but that a man, right in the midst of peril, should suddenly blossom out into a smiling countenance and a general hilarity of manner, was something extraordinary. People thought it must be a case of brain trouble. They watched the young man with interest as he walked with a springy step up and down deck. Every now and then a bright smile illuminated his face, and then he seemed to be ashamed that people should notice he was feeling hilarious at such a time, and alone with himself he had a habit of smiting his thigh and bursting out into a laugh that was long and low, rather than loud and boisterous. No one was more astonished at this change than Fleming, the politician. George met him on deck, and, to the great surprise of that worthy gentleman, smote him on the back and said:

"Good sir, I am afraid the other day, when you spoke to me, I answered a little gruffly. I beg to apologize. Come and have a drink with me."

"Oh, don't mention it," said Fleming, joyously; "we all of us have our little down turns now and then. Why, I have myself, when liquor is bad or scarce. You mightn't believe it, but some days I feel away down in the mouth. It is true, I have a receipt for getting it up again, which I always use—and that reminds me. Do you remember the governor of North Carolina said to the governor of South Carolina?"

"I'm sure I don't," said Wentworth; "you see I'm not very well versed in United States history."

"Well, there wasn't much politics about his remark. He merely said: 'It's a long time between drinks; come in and have something with me.' It seems to me you haven't tasted anything in my company since the voyage began."

"I believe," said Wentworth, "that is a true statement. Let us amend it as soon as possible, only in this case let me pay for the drinks. I invited you to drink with me."

"Not at all, not at all," cried Fleming; "not while I'm here. This is my treat, and it is funny to think that a man should spend a week with another man without knowing him. But, you see, I haven't known you till now."

And so the two worthy gentlemen disappeared into the smoking-room and rang the electric bell.

But it was not in his own stateroom that George Wentworth's jocularity came out at its best. He would grasp John Kenyon by the shoulder and shake that solemn man, over whose face a grim smile would appear when he noticed the exuberant joyfulness of his comrade.

"John," Wentworth cried, "why don't you laugh?"

"Well, it seems to me," replied his comrade, "that you are doing laughing enough for us both. It is necessary to have one sober one of the two, and I am substantial. I'm trying to keep the average about right. When you were in the dumps I had to be cheerful for two. Now that you feel so funny, I take a kind of holiday vacation, to rest me after my hard efforts at cheerfulness."

"Well, John, it seems to me too good to be true. What a plucky girl she was to do such a thing! How did she know but that the little vixen had a revolver with her, and might have shot her?"

"I suppose she didn't think about the matter at all."

"Have you seen her since that dramatic incident?"

"Seen whom? Miss Brewster?"

"No, no; I mean Miss Longworth."

"No; she hasn't appeared yet. I suppose she fears there will be a scene, and she is anxious to avoid it."

"Very likely that is the case," said Wentworth. "Well, you get to see her, you can tell her there is no danger. Our genial friend Fleming has had a talk with that newspaper woman, so he tells me, and the way he describes it is exceedingly picturesque. He has threatened her with giving away the 'snap,' as he calls it, to the other New York papers, and it seems that the only thing on earth that Miss Brewster is afraid of is the opposition press. So she has promised to say nothing more whatever about the incident."

"Then you have been talking with Fleming?"

"Certainly I have; a jovial good fellow he is, too. I have been doing something more than this; my persona in here life, was once caught in her own trap; and I shall inform them how it took place. And they'll be glad to get it, you bet! It will make quite interesting reading in the New York opposition papers some Sunday morning—about a column and a half, say. Edith Longworth and John Kenyon paced the deck together, and did not turn two of the crowd who could not tear themselves away from the front of the ship watching the gradually approaching tugboats. Purposely John Kenyon brought the girl who was with him past Miss Jennie Brewster, and although that person grinned with a good deal of anger at Edith, who blushed to her temples with fear and confusion, for nothing was said; and Kenyon knew that afterward his companion would feel easier in her mind about meeting the woman with whom she had had such a stormy five minutes. The tugboats speedily took the big steamship in tow, and slowly the four of them made progress toward Queenstown, it having been resolved to land all the passengers there and to allow the disabled vessel to be towed to Liverpool, if an examination of the hull showed such a course to be a safe one. The passengers bade each other good-by after they left the tender, and many that were to board the ship never saw each other again. One, at least, had few regrets and no good-bys to make.

CHAPTER XII.

Although Miss Jennie Brewster arrived in London angry with the world in general, and with several of its inhabitants in particular, she soon began to revel in the delights of the great city. It was so old that it was new to her, and she visited Westminster Abbey and other of its ancient landmarks in rapid succession. The cheapness of the hansoms delighted her, and she spent most of her time dashing around in a cab. She put up at one of the big hotels, and ordered many new dresses at a place in Regent street. She bought most of the newspapers morning and evening, and declared she could not find an interesting article in the whole assortment. From her point of view they were stupid and uninteresting, and she resolved to run down the editor of one of the big dailies when she got time, interview him, and discover how he reconciled it with his conscience to get out so dull a sheet every day.

She wrote to her editor in New York that London, though a slow town, was full of good material, and that nobody had touched it in the writing line since Dickens' time; therefore she proposed to write a series of articles on the metropolis that would make them up a bit. The editor cabled her to go ahead, and she went. Her adventures will form the subject of some future chapters.

Kenyon and Wentworth, having settled to the satisfaction of [illegible] the business [illegible] Canada, now turned their attention to the matter of the [illegible] three months' option of purchase. Kenyon estimated that the property worked as a mica mine alone would pay a handsome dividend on £50,000, while if a good market was to be had for the spar in which the mica was found, the mine would be cheap at £200,000. He said to Wentworth, however, that as they were to pay only £20,000 for the property, it seemed hardly fair to inflate the price to ten times that amount.

"Not a bit of it, John," said Wentworth, who was a practical man. "If the mine will pay a good dividend on that amount, then that is the right price for it. Now, we haven't any time to lose, so we must get to work. The first thing to do is to take these specimens of spar to some man who knows all about china manufacture, and find what demand there is for it in this country, and at what price. That I will attend to. The next thing is to get some good man who understands all about the formation of companies to join us. You spoke about the mine to young Longworth on board ship, and he name would be a great help to us in office. You go and see him, and interest him in the project if you can. When these two tasks are accomplished, we shall have made an excellent beginning."

Wentworth was an energetic man, who did not allow the grass to grow under his feet. He speedily discovered that Mr. Melville was manager and part owner of one of the largest china establishments in the country, with offices in London, and this man he sought an interview with, taking with him some of the specimens of spar.

"I want to know," he said to Melville, "if you use this material in the making of china. Is there much of a market for it, and at what price?"

Melville turned the specimen over and over in his hand, examining it critically. His great knowledge of his own business enabled him to instantly recognize the value of the material, but his face showed no eagerness or enthusiasm. When he spoke it was not to answer the questions, but to ask some on his own account.

"Where does this come from?"

"From a mine in America."

"Is there much of it there?"

"I control a mountain of it."

"Really. You are canvassing for others, perhaps."

"No. I intend to form a company for the working of that mine."

"What price are you asking for the property? Is the mine in operation, or is it merely projected?"

"It is in operation; that is, it is being operated as a mica mine, but my partner, Kenyon, who is a mining engineer, says this is more valuable than the mica. We are asking £200,000 for the mine."

"That is a very large sum," said Melville, placing the specimen on the desk before him. "I doubt if you will get it."

"Well, we expect to get it. Kenyon is at this moment with Mr. Longworth, who spoke of joining us. Longworth's objection was that the sum asked was too small."

"Old John Longworth is a good man to be associated with in a scheme of this kind."

"I am speaking of his nephew, William Longworth."

"Ah! that is not quite the same thing. I know both uncle and nephew. Did you when we [illegible] to take stock in the company?"

"I should be delighted to have you do so, but what I called for was to find out what you thought of this specimen, and to get an idea of the demand there was for it."

"Well, candidly, I don't think much of it. You see this kind of spar is one of the most common things in nature."

"But not in that state of purity, surely?"

"Perhaps not, but still pure enough for our purposes. If you will leave this specimen with me I will consult the manager of our works. I am merely giving you my own impression, but will be able to offer you a more definite opinion. If you will leave your address with me I will ask him to write to you. That will be more satisfactory."

This was somewhat disappointing, but Wentworth had to make the best of it, and the letter from the manager, when it ultimately came, was even more discomforting. The manager of the works asserted that the specimen submitted to him was of no commercial value, so far as he was able to judge.

Meanwhile Kenyon had fared no better with young Longworth. Longworth had some difficulty in recollecting that he had ever met Kenyon on shipboard or anywhere else, and he had no remembrance of the mine at all. He questioned John until he learned all the engineer knew about the matter, and then told his visitor abruptly that the scheme did not commend itself to him.

John Kenyon walked along Cheapside feeling very much downhearted over his rebuff with Longworth. The pretended forgetfulness of the young man, of course, he took at its proper value. He, nevertheless, felt very sorry the interview had been so futile, and instead of going back to Wentworth and telling him his experience he thought it best to walk off a little of his disappointment first. He was somewhat surprised when a man accosted him and, glancing up, he saw standing there a tall footman, arrayed in a gray coat that came down to his heels.

"I beg your pardon, sir," said the footman, "but Miss Longworth would like to speak to you."

"Miss Longworth!" said Kenyon, in surprise. "Where is she?"

"She is here in her carriage, sir."

The carriage had drawn up beside the pavement, and John Kenyon looked round in confusion to see that Miss Longworth was regarding him and the footman with an amused air. An elderly woman sat in the carriage opposite her, while a grave and dignified coachman, attired somewhat similarly to the footman, kept his place like a seated statue in front. John Kenyon took off his hat as he approached the young woman, whom he had not seen since the last day on the steamer.

"How are you, Mr. Kenyon?" said Edith Longworth, brightly, holding out her hand to the young man by her carriage. "Will you not step in? I want to talk to you, and I am afraid the police will not allow us to block such a crowded thoroughfare as Cheapside."

As she said this the nimble footman threw open the door of the carriage, while John, not knowing what to say, stepped inside and took his seat.

"Hilborn," said the young woman to the coachman; then, turning to Kenyon, she continued: "Will you not tell me where you are going, so that I may know where to set you down?"

"To tell you the truth," said John, "I do not think I was going anywhere. I am afraid I have not yet got over the delight of being back in London again, and I sometimes walk along the streets in rather a purposeless manner."

"Well, you did not look very delighted when I first caught sight of you. I thought you were most dejected, and that gave me courage enough to ask you to come and talk to me. I said to myself there is something wrong with the mica mine, and, with a woman's curiosity, I wanted to know all about it. Now tell me."

"There is really very little to tell. We have hardly begun yet. Wentworth is to-day looking over the figures I gave him, and I have been making a beginning by seeing some people who, I thought, might be interested in the mine."

"And were they?"

"No: they were not."

"Then that was the reason you were looking so distressed."

"I suppose it was."

"Well, now, Mr Kenyon, if you get discouraged after an interview with the first person you think will be interested in the mine, what will you do when a dozen or more people refuse to have anything to do with it?"

"I'm sure I don't know. I am afraid I am not the right person to float a mine on the London market. I am really a student, you see, and flatter myself I am a man of science. I know what I am about when I am in a mine, miles away from civilization; but when I get among men I feel somehow at a loss. I do not understand them. When a man tells me one thing to-day, and to-morrow calmly forgets all about it, I confess it—well—confuses me."

"Then the man you have seen to-day has forgotten what he told you yesterday. Is that the case?"

"Yes: that is partly the case."

"But, Mr. Kenyon, the success of your project is not going to depend upon what one man says, or two, or three, is it?"

"No; I don't suppose it is."

"Then, if I were you, I would not feel discouraged because one man has forgotten. I wish I were acquainted with our own man, and I would make him ashamed of himself, I think."

Kenyon flushed as she said this, but made no reply.

The coachman looked round as he came to Holborn, and Miss Longworth nodded to him, as he went on, without stopping, up into Oxford street.

"Now, I take a great interest in your mine, Mr. Kenyon, and hope to see you succeed with it. I wish I could help you, or, rather, I wish you would be frank with me, and let me know how I can help you. I know a good deal about city men and their ways, and I think I may be able to give you some good advice, at least, if you will have the condescension to consult me."

Again Kenyon flushed. "You are making game of me now, Miss Longworth. Of course, as you said on shipboard, it is but a very small matter."

"I never said any such thing. When did I say that?"

"You said that £50,000 was a small matter."

"Did I? Well, I am like your man who has forgotten; I have forgotten that. I remember saying something about it's being too small an amount for my father to deal with. Was not that what I said?"

"Yes, I think that was it. It conveyed the idea to my mind that you thought £50,000 a very trifling sum indeed."

Edith Longworth laughed. "What a terrible memory you have! I go no wonder at your city man forgetting. Are you sure what you told him did not happen longer ago than yesterday?"

"Yes, it happened some time before."

"Ah, I thought so. I am afraid it is our own terrible memory, and not his forgetfulness, that is to blame."

"Oh, I am not blaming him at all. A man has every right to change his mind, if he wants to."

"I thought only a woman had that privilege."

"No; for my part, I freely accord it to everybody; only sometimes it is a little disappointing."

"I can imagine that. In fact, I think no one could be a more undesirable acquaintance than a man who forgets today what he promised yesterday, especially if anything particular depended upon it. Now, I cannot you come to our house some evening and have a talk about the mine with my cousin or my father? My father could give you much valuable advice in reference to it, and I am sure that my cousin should help to carry this project on to success. It is better to talk with them there than at their office, because they are both so busy during the day that I am afraid they might not be able to give the time necessary to the discussion."

John Kenyon shook his head. "I am afraid," he said, "that would do no good. I do not think your cousin cares to have anything to do with the mine."

"How can you say that? Did he not discuss the matter with you on board ship?"

"Yes; we had some conversation about it there, but I imagine that—I really do not think he would care to go any farther with it."

"Oh, I see," said Edith Longworth. "My cousin is the man who 'forgot to day what he said yesterday.'"

"What am I to say, Miss Longworth? I do not want to say 'Yes,' and I cannot truthfully say 'No.'"

"You need say nothing. I know exactly how it has been. So he does not want to have anything to do with it? What reason did he give?"

"You will not say anything to him about the matter? I should be very sorry if he thought that I had talked to anyone else in reference to it."

"Oh, certainly not; I will say nothing to him at all."

"Well, he gave no particular reason; he simply seemed to have changed his mind. But I must say this, he did not appear to be very enthusiastic about it when I talked with him on board ship."

"Well, you see, Mr. Kenyon, it rests with me now to maintain the honor of the Longworth family. Do you want to make all the profit there is to be made in the mica mine—that is yourself and your friend, Mr. Wentworth?"

"How do you mean 'All the profit?'"

"Why, I mean again—would you share the profit with anybody?"

"Certainly, if that person could help us to form the company."

"Very well; it was on that basis you were going to take in my cousin as a partner, was it not?"

"Yes."

"Then I should like to share in the profits of the mine if he does not take an interest in it. If you will let me pay the preliminary expenses of forming this company, and if you will then give me a share of what you make, I shall be glad to furnish the money you need at the outset."

John Kenyon looked at Miss Longworth and he smile. "You are very ingenious, Miss Longworth, but I can see, in spite of your way of putting it, that what you propose is merely a form of charity. Suppose we did not succeed in forming our company, how could we repay you the money?"

"You would not need to repay the money. I would take that risk. It is, in a way, a sort of speculation. If you form the company, then I shall expect a very large reward for furnishing the funds. It is purely selfishness on my part. I believe I have a head for business. Women in this country do not get such chances of developing their business talents as they seem to have in America. In that country there are women who have made fortunes for themselves. I feel sure that I believe you will succeed in forming your company. If you, or if Mr. Wentworth, were capitalists, of course, there would be no need of my assistance. If I were alone I could not form a company. You and Mr. Wentworth can do what I cannot do. You can appear before the public and attend to all preliminaries. On the other hand I believe I can do what neither of you can do; that is, I can supply a certain amount of money each week to pay the expenses of forming the company; because a company is not formed in London for nothing, I assure you. Perhaps you think you have simply to go and see a sufficient number of people and get your company formed. I fancy you will find it not so easy as all that. Besides this business interest, I have in it, I have a very friendly interest in Mr. Wentworth." As she said this, she bent over toward John Kenyon and spoke in a lower tone of voice. "Please do not tell him so, because I think that he is a young man who has possibilities of being conceited."

"I shall say nothing about it," said Kenyon, dolefully.

"Please do not. By the way, I wish you would give me Mr. Wentworth's address, so that I may communicate with him if a good idea strikes me, or if I find out anything of value in forming our company."

Kenyon took out a card, wrote the address of Wentworth upon it, and handed it to her.

"Thank you," she said. "You see I deeply sympathized with Mr. Wentworth for what he had to pass through on the steamer."

"He was very grateful for all you did for him on that occasion," replied Kenyon.

"I am glad of that. People, as a general thing, are not grateful for what their friends do for them. I am glad, therefore, to find that Wentworth is an exception. Well, suppose you talk with him about what I have said before you make up your own mind. I shall be quite content with whatever share of the profits you allow me."

"Ah, that is not business, Miss Longworth."

"No, it is not; but I am dealing with you—that is, with Mr. Wentworth—in this matter, and I am sure both of you will be fair to me. Perhaps it would be better not to tell him who is to furnish the money. Just say you have met a friend to-day who offers, for a reasonable share of the profits, to supply all the money necessary for the preliminary expenses. You will consult with him about it, will you not?"

"Yes, if it is your wish."

"Certainly it is my wish; and I also wish you to do it so nicely that you shall receive my name from it more successfully than you could do were my cousin's name from me this afternoon."

"I am afraid I am very awkward," said John, blushing.

"No, you are very honest, that is all. You have not become accustomed to the art of telling what is not true. Now, this is where we live. Will you come in?"

"Thank you, no; I'm afraid not," said John. "I must really be going now."

"Let the coachman take you to your station."

"No, no, it is not worth the trouble; it is only a step from here."

"It is no trouble. Which is your station, South Kensington?"

"Yes."

"Very well. Drive to South Kensington station, Parker," she said to the coachman; and then, running up the steps, she was in her hand in good-by as the carriage turned.

And so John Kenyon, without the price of the carriage and horses to his name, drove in this gorgeous equipage to the underground station and took his train for Kensington.

As he stepped from the carriage at South Kensington, young Longworth came out of the station on his way home, and was simply dumfounded to see Kenyon in the Longworth's carriage.

John passed him without noticing who it was, and just as the coachman was going to start again Longworth said to him:

"Parker, have you been picking up fares in the street?"

"Oh, no, sir," replied the respectable Parker, "the young gentleman as just left us came up from the city with Miss Longworth."

"Ah, indeed? Where did you pick him up, Parker?"

"We picked him up in Cheapside, sir."

"Ah, very good. I will just step inside," and with that, muttering some expressions on the cheek of Kenyon, he stepped into the carriage and drove home.

CHAPTER XIII.

The chances are that no matter under what circumstances young Longworth and Kenyon had first met, the former would have disliked the latter. Although strong friendships are formed between people who are very much unlike, still it must not be forgotten that equally strong hatreds have arisen between people precisely because they are of opposite natures. No two young men could have been more unlike each other, and as Longworth recalled the different meetings he had had with Kenyon, he admitted to himself that he disliked the fellow extremely. The evident friendship which his cousin felt for Kenyon added a bitterness to this dislike that was rapidly turning it into hate. However, he calmed down sufficiently on going home in the carriage to know that it was better to say nothing about her meeting with Kenyon unless she introduced the subject. After all, the carriage was hers, not his, and he recognized that fact. He wondered how much Kenyon had told her of the interview at his uncle's office. He flattered himself, however, that he knew enough of women to be sure that she would very speedily refer to the subject, and then he hoped to find out just how much had been said. To his surprise [illegible] said nothing at all about the matter, neither that evening nor the next morning, and consequently he went to his office in rather a bewildered state of mind.

On arriving at his room in the city he found Melville waiting for him.

Melville shook hands with young Longworth and, taking a mineral specimen from his pocket, placed it on the young man's desk, saying:

"I suppose you know where that comes from, sir?"

Longworth looked at it in a bewildered sort of way, turning it round and round in his hand.

"I haven't the slightest idea, really."

"No? I was told you were interested in the mine from which this was taken. Mr. Wentworth called on me yesterday and gave your name as one of those who were concerned with the mine."

"Ah, yes; I was, yes, I have—some interest in the mine."

"Well, it is about that I came to talk with you. Where is the mine situated?"

"It is near the Ottawa river, I believe, some distance above Montreal. I am not certain about its exact position, but it is somewhere in that neighborhood."

"I thought by the way Wentworth talked it was in the United States. He mentioned another person as being his partner in the affair. I forgot his name."

"John Kenyon, probably."

"Kenyon! Yes, I think that was the name. Yes, I am sure it was. Now may I ask what is your connection with that mine? Are you a partner of Wentworth's and Kenyon's? Are you the chief owner of the mine, or is the mine owned by them?"

"In the first place, Mr. Melville, I should like to know why you ask me these questions."

Melville laughed. "Well, I will tell you. We should like to know what chance there is of our getting a controlling interest in the mine. That is very frankly put, is it not?"

"Yes, it is. But whom do you mean by 'we?' Who else besides yourself?"

"By 'we' I mean the china company to which I belong. This mineral is useful in making china. That I suppose you know?"

"Yes, I was aware of that," answered Longworth, although he heard it now for the first time.

"Very well, then; I should like to know who is the owner of the mine."

"The owner of the mine at present is some foreigner, whose name and address I do not know. The two young men you speak of have an option on that mine for a certain length of time; how long I don't know. They have been urging me to go in with them to form a company for the floating of that mine, for £200,000, on the London market."

"He mentioned £200,000," said Melville. "It struck me as rather a large amount."

"Do you think so? Well, the objection I had to it was that it was too small."

"It seems to me the young men have an exaggerated idea of the value of this mineral if they think it will pay dividends on £200,000."

"This mineral is not all there is in the mine, in fact. It is already paying a dividend on £50,000 or thereabouts because of the mica in it. It is being mined for mica alone. To tell the truth, I did not know much about the other mineral."

"And do you think the mine is worth £200,000?"

"Frankly, I do not."

"Then why are you connected with it?"

"I am not connected with it—at least, not definitely connected with it. I have the matter under consideration. Of course, if there is anything approaching a swindle in it, I shall have nothing to do with it. I will depend largely upon the figures that the young men show me whether I have anything to do with it or not."

"I see; I understand your position." Then, lowering his voice, Melville leaned over toward Longworth and said: "You are a man of business. Now I want to ask you what would be the chance of our getting the mine at something like the original option price, very much less than £200,000? We do not want to have too many in it. In fact, if you could get it for us at a reasonable rate, and did not care to be troubled with the property yourself, we would take the whole of it ourselves."

Young Longworth pondered a moment, and then said to Melville:

"Do you mean to freeze out the other two fellows, as they say in America?"

"I do not know about freezing out, but, of course, with the other two there is so much less profit to be divided. We should like to deal with just as few as possible."

"Exactly. I see what you mean. Well, I think it can be done. Are you in any very great hurry for the mine?"

"Not particularly. Why?"

"Well, if things are worked rightly, I don't know but that we could get it for the original option. That would mean, of course, to wait until this first option had run out."

"Wouldn't there be a little danger in that? They may form their company in the meantime, and then we should lose everything. Our interest in the matter is as much to prevent anyone getting hold of the mine as to get it ourselves."

"I see. I will think it over. I believe it can be done without much risk; but, of course, we shall have to be reasonably quiet about the matter."

"Oh, certainly, certainly."

"Very good. I will see you again after I have thought over the affair, and we can come to some arrangement."

It may say that our manager has written a note to Wentworth saying that this mineral is of no particular use to us."

"Exactly," said young Longworth with a look of intelligence.

"So, of course, in speaking with Wentworth about the matter, it is just as well not to mention us in any way."

"I shall not do so. I will leave the matter in your hands for the present."

"Yes; do so. I will think it over this afternoon, and probably see Wentworth and Kenyon to-morrow. There is no immediate hurry, for I happen to know they have not done anything yet."

With that Mr. Melville took his leave, and young Longworth paced up and down the room, evolving a plan that would at once bring him money and relieve him from the necessity of making it lively for John Kenyon.

That night at home young Longworth waited for his cousin to say something about Kenyon, but he soon saw that she did not intend to speak of him at all. So he said to her:

"Edith, do you remember Kenyon and Wentworth, who were on board our steamer?"

"Do I remember them? Certainly."

"Well, do you know they had a mining property for sale?"

"Yes."

"I have been thinking about it. To tell the truth, Kenyon called at my office a day or two ago, and at that time, not having given the subject much thought, I could not give him any encouragement; but I have been pondering over it since, and have almost concluded to help them. What do you think about it?"

"Oh, I think it would be an excellent plan. I am sure the property is a good one, or John Kenyon would have nothing to do with it. I shall write a note to them, if you think it best, inviting them up here to talk to you about it."

"Oh, that will not be necessary at all. I do not want people to come here to talk business. My office is the proper place."

"Still, we met them in a friendly way on board the steamer, and I think it would be nice if they would come here some evening and talk over the matter with you."

"I don't believe in introducing business into a person's home. This would be purely a business conversation, and it may as well take place at my office, or at Wentworth's, if he has one, as I suppose he has."

"Oh, certainly; his address is—"

"Oh, you know it, do you?"

Edith blushed as she realized what she had said; then she remarked: "Is there any harm in my knowing the business address of Mr. Wentworth?"

"Oh, not at all—not at all. I merely wondered how you happened to know his address when I didn't."

"Well, it doesn't matter how I know it. I am glad you are going to join him, and I am sure you will be successful. You will see them to-morrow?"

"I think so. I shall call on Wentworth and have a talk with him about it. Of course we may not be able to come to a workable arrangement. If not, it really does not so very much matter. But if I can make satisfactory terms with them, I will help them to form their company."

When he went to her room she wrote a note. It was addressed to George Wentworth in the city, but above that address was the name of John Kenyon. She said:

"Dear Mr. Kenyon: I felt certain at the time you spoke to me about the sale of it, that my cousin was not so much at fault in forgetting his conversation as you thought. We had a talk about the mine, and when he calls upon you tomorrow, I am going to ask him if he will you to know that I said nothing whatever to him about what you said to me. He mentioned the subject first, I wanted you to know this, because you might feel embarrassed when you met him, by thinking I had sent him to you. Trusting it will be all right in the case. He goes to you of his own accord, and I am sure you will find his assistance in forming a company very valuable. I am glad to think you will be partners. Yours very truly, Edith Longworth."

She gave this letter to her maid to post, and young Longworth met the maid in the hall with the letter in her hand. He somehow suspected, after the foregoing conversation, to whom the letter was addressed.

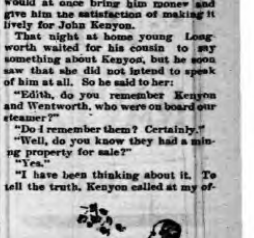
"Where are you going with that?"

"To the post, sir."

"I am going out; to save you the trouble, I will take it."

After passing the corner, he looked at the address on the envelope; then he swore to himself a little. If he had been a villain in a play he would have opened the letter; but he did not. He merely dropped it into the first pillar box he came to, and in due time it reached John Kenyon.

TO BE CONTINUED.



"Edith, do you remember Kenyon and Wentworth, who were on board our steamer?"

PARCEL MESSENGER WAR

OVER NOW AS FAR AS STEVENSON, OF SOMERVILLE, IS CONCERNED

By His Perseverance He Convinces the Company That He Is a Good Man, and It Employs Him to Work for Them.

The war between Purchasing Agent A. G. Stevenson, of Somerville, and the United States Express Company is at an end. The fight, which had assumed large proportions, was precipitated months ago by the action of the Central Railroad at the instigation of the United States Express Company, to break up the messenger business carried on by Stevenson between Somerville and New York. Stevenson had acted as messenger and purchasing agent for the local merchants for twenty-two years.

Three of the railroad's detectives have been constantly engaged in shadowing Stevenson in order to prevent him from boarding the trains with his parcels. A number of New York business men and many of the commuters on the road came to the aid of Stevenson in his fight with the two big corporations. He was constantly aided in outwitting the detectives. Mutual friends finally interceded and as a result Stevenson was requested to call at the New York office of the United States Express Company. Stevenson met Superintendent Topping of the company, who said:

"Stevenson, you will acknowledge that the United States Express Company is right in this fight?"

"No, sir," replied Stevenson, "but I will acknowledge that you were right in trying to enforce the provisions of your contract for the exclusive right to carry express matter. you will understand that with me it is a fight for a living and the right to earn it by the legitimate means that I have employed for twenty-two years."

"And that," said Superintendent Topping, making Stevenson warmly by the hand, "entitles you to our sincere consideration. You will understand that with us this has been a fight of principal rather than dollars and cents. The success or failure of your opposition would establish a precedent which might to some extent affect the 30,000 miles of railroad over which we operate our business."

At the end of an interview of three hours Stevenson was offered a salary to continue his services as purchasing agent for the merchants and residents of Somerville in the interest of the United States Express Company, and this he accepted.

The United States Express Company is now inaugurating a rapid delivery system for the benefit of residents in the suburban towns which is intended to do away with local messengers. An agent will canvass the town each morning for orders. He will purchase goods in New York and see to it that they are shipped promptly by express. His services will be paid for by the express company and his patrons will be required to pay only the regular rate of express charges on the packages.

It is hoped that Whitfield Frazee will accept a similar position for Plainfield.

—The Garden State Poultry and Pigeon Association will hold a meeting, Friday afternoon, at 19 Park Place, New York, to settle up the business of the show held in Plainfield last week.

CAGES ATTACHED.

William Hand Don't Want to Risk His Pay For Carting.

The history of the cages that played such an important part in the recent poultry and pigeon show must be a varied one. Another chapter in this eventful history was enacted last Tuesday when the cages that contained them was attached by Constable Mattox on a claim from William Hand & Son for about $10.

It was Hand's trucks that carried these cages over to the Jersey Cycle Academy and then brought them back after the show was over. They are the property of the Spratt Patent, and Mr. Hand was promised his pay as soon as the goods were delivered at the car, but it was not forthcoming. The car was soon to leave and to make sure of his claim Mr. Hand appeared before Justice Nash last Tuesday and the writ of attachment was issued. The car is now being held until Mr. Hand hears from the owners of the property inside.

LAID DOWN TO DIE IN THE WOODS

Umbrella Mender Stricken With Fever Found Unconscious by a Hunter.

David Romel, of Liberty Corner, while hunting in the woods north of Liberty Corner Saturday found an unconscious man lying on the ground. Romel secured assistance and the man was taken to Liberty Corner. Dr. Fields examined the man and found that he had fever and that the first joints of his fingers were frozen. All medicines had to be forced down his throat, while the man pleaded with the doctor to let him die.

The man, who is an umbrella mender, refuses to give his name. It is supposed that he was taken sick while going through the woods and laid down to die. Before laying down the man had gathered leaves into two sacks and had put his feet into one sack and his head into the other. His recovery is thought to be doubtful.

KICKED IN THE JAW.

An Ugly Horse Lands a Hoof in Alfred Ackerson's Face.

A narrow escape from a broken jaw occured Tuesday afternoon when Alfred Ackerson, coachman for F. A. Pope, was kicked in the left side of the face by one of Mr. Pope's horses. The blow was so heavy that it knocked the coachman flat and stunned him for a few minutes. When he recovered he sought Dr. Tomlinson who prescribed the proper treatment. Mr. Ackerman's face pains him very much, but he considers that he was fortunate in not having any broken bones.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surface of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. Street Car Jumped the Track.

One of the Somerset trolley cars ran off the track in front of the High School building, last Tuesday, and remained off until the car from the mountain came down and pulled it on.

Mr. Horr Improving.

Ex-Congressman Roswell G. Horr, of Park avenue, is considerably improved in health today and his recovery is now looked on as very probable.

A Significant Departure.

With the departure of another year when a review is made of the condition of affairs, it is only right that some thought be given to the physical body which enables everyone to battle with life's problem and figure for themselves the profit or loss on the trial balance sheet. Though the bank account may be large and each one's material gain be great, it would not be surprising if it dauws upon many that good health has been greatly impoverished by the low condition of the blood. It is in this state that the lactic acid in the vital fluid attacks the fibrous tissues, particularly the joints, making known the local manifestations of rheumatism. Thousands of people have found in Hood's Sarsaparilla the great blood purifier, a positive and permanent cure of rheumatism.

COMETS AND METEORS.

INTELLIGENTLY EXPLAINED AT THE UNIVERSITY EXTENSION LECTURE.

The Distinguished Features About These Heavenly Bodies Discussed by Prof. Prentiss in an Interesting Manner.

The attendance at the last astronomical lecture in the University Extension course, which was delivered by Prof. Prentiss Tuesday in the chapel of the Crescent Avenue Presbyterian church, was not as large as usual, owing to the exceedingly bleak and unpleasant weather, but everyone who was present was thoroughly repaid for coming, by the great interest of the lecture and the fine views which illustrated it. "Comets and Meteors" was Prof. Prentiss' subject, as unusually fascinating one, and a fitting close to the course of lectures which have set before the people of Plainfield the most important facts in the most majestic of sciences, astronomy.

The first picture thrown on the screen was one showing the sort of telescope used in the study of comets. Those bodies, very different from the stars and planets, which from time to time appear in the heavens, remain visible for some weeks or months, pursue a longer or shorter path, and then vanish in the distance. When one of them is bright enough to be seen by the naked eye, it looks like a star surrounded by a luminous fog, and usually carries with it a streaming tail of hazy light. The majority are faint wisps of light, visible only with the telescope.

Comets obey Newton's law of gravitation. A few, called periodic comets, move in ellipses; the greater number, however, move in parabolas, and never return to the solar system after one visit. They consist of the nucleus, a shining bright point, or star-like body in the coma, or hazy mass surrounding the comet; the tail, a very thin appendage repelled from the sun, and in some bright comets the envelopes or streams of matter exhaled from time to time. The size of a comet is often enormous, while the quantity of matter in it is small. Its approach to the sun is attended by increasing brightness, the formation of a tail, faster motion and the throwing off of successive envelopes, which stream behind entering into the tail. Other irregular and curious phenomena are manifested by many comets, greatly complicating their explanation.

The most remarkable thing about comets which has lately been made known, is the identity of their orbits with the pats of great meteor swarms. Indeed, the most widely accepted explanation of their physical constitution is that they are clouds of meteoric particles closely aggregated.

Mr. Prentiss then turned his attention to meteors, or shooting stars, those brilliant points of light or small bodies that shoot across the sky sometimes leaving a luminous train behind them. The greater part of them are consumed as they are heated to incandescence by contact with the air, but many of them have been large enough to reach the earth. Some are stones; some masses of pure iron. They are composed of the same substances as the earth, and seem to be of a fiery origin. The pieces weigh from a few grains to 500 pounds or more. Their most distinctive external feature is the black, varnish like crust that covers them, formed by the fusion of the surface during the meteor's swift flight through the air.

Meteors seem to be the dust of space slowly settling on the earth's surface. At particular seasons of the year, in August and Novem ber, they appear in great numbers or "showers," and seem to radiate from one point in the heavens, therefore called the "radiant." The periodic recurrence of these showers led to the discovery that they were swarms of meteors disposed in a ring revolving in a fixed orbit about the sun. The November shower was proved to move in a long ellipse with a thirty-three year period. The next great shower will be in November, 1898. Schiaparelli showed that the August shower moved in the orbit of the comet of 1862. The November meteorite showers arise from the earth encountering a swarm of particles following Temple's comet in its orbit, and other swarms are shown to be related to other comets. The comet may be simply a more closely aggregated crowd of these meteors, and in the meteorite we may have "a part of a comet."

Meteorites have acquired great importance in recent years, because Lockyer has advanced the "Meteoritic Hypothesis," by which he proposes to show that all the heavenly bodies are either swarms of meteoric stones or have been formed by their aggregation.

MIND OF THE MISTRESS

THE SERVANT GIRL QUESTION DISCUSSED BY WOMEN.

The Duty of the Employer Towards Domestic Help One of the Things Considered—Too Much Should Not be Asked of Them.

There is no more important question in the households of this country than the relation of mistress and servant, and so the discussion on that subject at the meeting of the Plainfield Branch Alliance of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Women, held in All Soul's church, yesterday afternoon, proved a very interesting one. All the members had plenty of their own experiences to relate and many valuable ideas were presented.

The subject for discussion was in detail as follows: "Domestic Service. What are the duties of a mistress of a house towards a domestic? Is the relation a purely business one? Questions of recreation, good books, extravagance in dress, improvidence, protection of young girls. How can an employer advise and instruct without undue interference with the liberty of a domestic?" The vice-president, Mrs. E. W. Conklin, was in the chair while Mrs. S. R. Krom filled her usual position as secretary.

The meeting opened with the reading of several communications of of interest only to the members of the society. Then the topic was taken up and a general discussion of the subject followed. It was remarked that the mistress should know all about the household duties that the domestic should perform so that she might know just what might be expected from her. The ignorance of many young housekeepers was spoken of and how much might be saved by proper training and practical knowledge. The effect on the servants was very deplorable as they would not have the respect for the housekeeper utterly ignorant of the practical phases of the work that they would for one well acquainted with all the details. One lady suggested that there should be regular training schools from which the help would be turned out thoroughly equipped for the work and several schools of that kind were referred to by the other members.

The subject was then taken up by topics. One member thought that the mistress should recognize that the domestic had not had all the advantages that she had enjoyed and should overlook her little faults and deal with her patiently. One lady asked if the others thought that a servant showed more respect to the mistress that took no interest in them whatever than to the one who listened to all their little troubles. The opinion seemed to be that servants should be treated in a kindly and Christian manner and not as mere machines.

As to whether the relation is a purely business one, the ladies seemed to think that it was not. One told of the way in which the colored people of the south were treated as one of the family in many cases, and the difference here. Various experiences were related.

The question of recreations was discussed, and it was advised that the mistresses should encourage the participating in good recreation. The worst, one lady said, with the Plainfield servants was that, as a general thing, they went out nights much more than they should. The work of Father Smythe and Father Miller among them was particularly well spoken of and the good results commended.

It was a question as to whether the mistress should try to influence her domestic against extravagance in dress and the ladies were of the opinion that a hint by word or example, now and then was a good thing.

The case that recently came up in the local courts between a lady and her domestic over a demand for wages but ended in the latter's being discharged was discussed and all were of the opinion that a mistress should stand up for her rights even though it was rather unpleasant.

Many personal experiences were given, many of which were somewhat humorous, and the meeting proved an interesting one. All present took some part in the discussion and many new ideas were suggested.

A Wreck at White House.

UP THE RHINE AWHEEL

REV. C. E. HERRING RELATES EXPERIENCES OF A FOREIGN TRIP.

The Remarks Illustrated, With Stereopticon Views of Different Scenes Viewed on the Cycling Trip Last Summer.

The large audience that filled the First Presbyterian church last evening were delighted with the illustrated lecture given by the pastor, Rev. C. E Herring, on the subject, 'Up the Rhine on a Wheel.'

Last summer Mr. Herring and his friend, Fred Bettman, took a wheeling trip abroad, and they gathered an immense amount of useful knowledge concerning the countries through which they passed, and the first lecture given Tuesday was the outcome of the trip. The views exhibited were probably finer in any ever produced. They beautifully described Belgium and Switzerland, with all the principal cities and towns. The world renowned Rhine in all its grandeur was shown to the best advantage and everyone present went away with far more knowledge of this beautiful body of water than they had before.

In connection with the principal places shown there was attached many traditions of thrilling nature and these points made the lecture one of great pleasure. One fact prominent above the others, was that the counties visited have some of the finest roads for wheeling to be found anywhere, and in every instance the wagon road runs parallel and adjacent to the railroad.

The last pictures shown by Mr. Herring were in Switzerland and they were exceedingly fine.

An excellent picture of Fred Bettman was shown and the audience gave evidences of their appreciation. The next lecture by Mr. Herring on "Italy" will no doubt receive the hearty commendation that was accorded the one of last evening.

FLYER TOOK HIS LIFE.

A HUNGARIAN FATALLY INJURED WHILE PICKING COAL.

The Accident Occurred at Fisher's Crossing, Near Bound Brook—Died Before He Arrived at the Hospital in This City.

A tragic death occurred last Tuesday near Fisher's crossing, above Bound Brook, on the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad, when a Hungarian was almost instantly killed by the Royal Blue Line train which passes through this city, toward New York, at 9:55 o'clock. As far as can be learned, the aged man was picking coal on the tracks, and he did not hear the approaching flyer, which struck him near the head.

The engineer, knowing that he had struck a man, stopped his train, when it was learned that the Hungarian was horribly mangled. He was picked up and brought to this city on the following way train. It is said the life left the body by the time Grant avenue was reached.

When the train arrived at Plainfield the ambulance was called and the unfortunate man was removed to the hospital, where an examination was made, chiefly for the purpose of giving a burial permit.

Upon further inquiry it was learned that the man's name was Frank Buner, an Italian, aged thirty-eight years, and that he came to this country last March and settled at Bound Brook. The man had been out of work since coming to this country. He leaves a wife, who called at the hospital this morning and identified her husband.

Masonic Officers Elected.

Jerusalem Lodge, No. 26, F. and A. M., held their annual election of officers in Blackwell building last Tuesday and resulted as follows: Worshipful Master, Stephen Beech ing; senior warden, H. O. Hance; junior warden, G. T. Dunham; secretary, Albert Yeager; treasurer, Alex Titsworth; representative to Masonic Hall Association, Walter H. Freeman; trustees, L. B. Woolston, Dr. L. S. Poock and Henry Liefke. The attendance of members was unusually large. The installation will take place on the first meeting night in January.

Scaly eruptions on the head, chapped hands and lips, cuts, bruises, scalds, burns are quickly cured by DeWitt's Witch Hazel Salve. It is at present the article most used for piles, and it always cures them. L. W. Randolph, 143 East Front street.

SUBSCRIPTION DANCES.

SOCIAL EVENTS ARRANGED FOR THE WINTER AT THE CASINO.

Three Dances to Be Given That Will Afford Society People a Chance to Enjoy Themselves—The Patronesses.

Announcements were issued Tuesday of a series of subscription dances to be given in the Casino during the coming winter. As the old assemblies have been given up it was feared that Plainfield might be without the regular winter dances, but the present announcement settles the matter very pleasantly.

The dances are to be three in number and will be given at the Casino of the Union County Country Club on the evenings of Thursday, Dec. 31st, Monday, Jan. 25th, and Monday, Feb. 22d.

Subscription for the series will be five dollars and may be paid to Clifton Wharton, Jr., 117 Hillside avenue. An answer is requested not later than Dec. 19th.

Sixteen patronesses will lend their names to insure the success of the new dances. The list is an admirable one in every way. The following ladies are on the list:

Mrs. Marion S. Ackerman, Mrs. John T. Baker, Mrs. Harry V. Borden, Mrs. Edgar T. Corliss, Mrs. John B. Dumont, Mrs. Samuel Huntington, Mrs. John Dodd Miller, Mrs. Wm. J. Boome, Mrs. William L. Saunders, Mrs. Augustus D. Shepard, Mrs. Walter E. Stewart, Mrs. J. Evarts Tracy, Mrs. Evarts Tracy, Mrs. George H. Van Boskerck, Mrs. Orville T. Waring, Mrs. Clifton Wharton Jr.

The committee of gentlemen who have the detail of the affairs in charge is Howard W. Beebe, Harry V. Borden, Howard Huntington, O. G. Waring, Clifton Wharton, Jr. Under this management the dances should prove an undoubted success.

Besides these functions there will be the five dances of the Cotillion club, the dates of which are not yet announced. Taken together with the half dozen or so of private dances during the season these should effectually keep Plainfield from being dull.

A POSTOFFICE ROBBED.

THIEVES BREAK INTO THE STORE OF POSTMASTER STOVER, OAK TREE

Rifled the Stamp and Money Drawer, But Did Not Get Much Cash Booty—Ransacked the Other Part of the Store.

The postoffice and general grocery store of Postmaster Stover at Oak Tree was broken into and robbed some time during Tuesday night. The burglars pried open one of the windows in the office and once inside they first rifled the stamp and money drawer. A considerable number of postage stamps and a small amount of change was taken. In the store everything was found in disorder this morning, but aside from cigars and tobacco, nothing of great value was missing.

A pick and an ordinary ax were found this morning firmly embedded in the window casing.

The place is in an isolated locality, and it is thought the intruders may have been tramps. The location is some three miles from here, and the Plainfield police have no jurisdiction in the matter.

Fair Now in Full Blast.

There was a much larger attendance at the firemen's fair Tuesday and everybody was given a good time. The sales were good and the dancing was a marked feature. As usual the phonograph was a great attraction.

The committee in charge will try to add new features each night during the rest of the week.

TO BE A NOTABLE EVENT

BRILLIANT MEN TO BE PRESENT AT THE MAYOR'S DINNER.

The Date Fixed For Tuesday Evening, December 29th—Committee of Prominent Citizens Arranging the Details.

The committee of citizens who are in charge of the complimentary dinner to be given to Mayor Gilbert in honor of the completion of his Mayoralty term of six years, met at the home of Col. Mason W. Tyler, of West Seventh street, Tuesday, and continued the work of arranging the details for this notable event in Plainfield's public life. The following gentlemen were present at the meeting: J. Evarts Tracy, Craig A. Marsh, J. P. MacDonald, Wm. F. Arnold, DeWitt C. Ivins, George VanBoskerck, E. T. Barrows Col. Mason W. Tyler, E. L. Walz, Mayor-elect Charles J. Fisk, E. C. Perkins, A. H. Atterbury, George Beebe, Ernest R. Ackerman and F. W. Runyon. Those of the committee who were unable to be present were J. Wesley Johnson, Rowland Cox and Stephen A. Ginna. It will be seen that there are a number of Democrats as well as Republicans mentioned among these gentlemen, so that the event will be a representative one in every respect.

At the previous preliminary meeting held last week, Col. Tyler was made chairman and Councilman Barrows secretary. They were made permanent officers of the committee, and W. F. Arnold was added as treasurer.

Last week Mayor elect Fisk was appointed to confer with Mayor Gilbert as to whether December 29th would be an agreeable time for the latter to have the dinner take place. Tuesday night Mr. Fisk presented the following letter from Mr. Gilbert:

Mayor's Office,
Plainfield, N. J., December 15.

Hon. C. J. Fisk,

Dear Sir: I am in receipt of your favor of this date extending to me an invitation to meet my friends and fellow citizens at a dinner to be given in my honor on the evening of the 29th inst. Permit me to say that I accept the invitation with a great deal of pleasure, and confess with as much modesty as I am the possessor of that I regard the proposed action as a very great honor to me.

Sincerely Yours,
A. Gilbert.

After the reading of this letter it was decided to give the dinner in the Casino of the Union County Country Club on Tuesday evening, December 29th. The following sub-committees were appointed to arrange details: Programme, invitations, speakers, etc.: Roland Cox, E. C. Perkins, Craig A. Marsh, Col. Mason W. Tyler; dinner and house arrangements, C. J. Fisk, D. C. Ivins and F. W. Runyon.

That the affair will be one of the most notable gatherings ever held in Plainfield is an assured fact. It is calculated that there will be covers laid for from 125 to 150, and already seventy-eight have signified their intention of attending. Governor Griggs and Vice-President-elect Hobart have been invited. William Brookfield, the noted New York lawyer and Republican leader, who is a close personal friend of Mayor Gilbert, has signified his intention of accepting the invitation that has been extended to him to attend.

RECEIVED AN UNEXPECTED VISIT.

A Genuine Surprise Given to W. F. Hamilton in the Borough.

A surprise party, that was complete in every detail, was tendered to W. F. Hamilton at his home on Verdon avenue, North Plainfield, last Tuesday. It was in commemoration of his birthday. The guests met at the residence of Thomas M Neely, of Watchung avenue, and then went over to the home of Mr. Hamilton only to find him not "at home." They did not have to wait long, however, for he was soon heard coming up the steps leading to the front door, and the party then sang. "He's a Jolly Good Fellow." They brought gifts, most appropriate, and the evening was spent in dancing and divers other amusements. The guests included: Mr. and Mrs. T. M. Neely, Mr. and Mrs. John Berkhan, Mr. and Mrs. D. T. Kenney, Mr. and Mrs. Wilkins, Mr. A. E. Kenney, Mr. and Mrs. James E. Bally, Mr. and Mrs. James Harper and Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Carney.

A Wayfarer.

A man giving the name of John Keyser, and his residence near Lake Superior, applied for a night's lodging in the borough last Tuesday at 7 o'clock. The man stated that he was on his way to join relatives living in Massachusetts. Chief Marshal Wilson gave him a place in the lockup and this morning he started off feeling much better for a good night's rest.

The old lady was right when she said the child might die if they waited for the doctor. She saved the little one's life with a few doses of One Minute Cough Cure. She had used it for croup before. L. W. Randolph, 143 West Front street.

SUNDAY LIQUOR SALES.

IT IS SAID THAT THERE IS A PLAN TO LEGALIZE THE TRAFFIC.

The Christian Citizenship Union Will Nip It in the Bud if Possible, However, by Public Agitation Against Such a Law.

The Executive Committee of the Christian Citizenship held a meeting at Trenton, Monday, at which they discussed the story to the effect that the liquor dealers of the State would attempt to have a bill passed at the next Legislature allowing them to sell liquor on Sunday. They decided to fight any such legislation and passed resolutions urging pastors throughout the state to protest against such legislation. They also decided to suggest to the friends of temperance that an effort be made next fall to elect one Assemblyman from each county who would oppose all attempts at any future legislation of this kind.

These officers were elected: President, Rev. B. Edward Young, Newark; vice-president, Albert G. Lawson, Camden; secretary, Rev. W. E. Davis, Lebanon; treasurer, Edgar W. Moore, Elizabeth.

The Anti-Liquor League of New Jersey held its annual convention yesterday. Addresses were delivered by Rev. A. G. Lawson, of Camden, and S. Z. Batten, of Morristown, and the following officers elected: President, A. G. Lawson, of Camden; secretary, D. Hart Breun, of Belvidere; treasurer, Ross Slack, of Trenton. The Executive Committee were empowered to prevent the passage of any liquor laws by the Legislature. It was also decided to introduce at the next session the "Twelve Signers" bill and measure known as the "Screen and Blind" bill.

JUST SWEET SIXTEEN.

Miss Sarah Ball Given a Party in Honor of the Event.

A very pleasant birthday party was given to Miss Sarah Ball, of Myrtle avenue, last Tuesday in honor of her sixteenth birthday. New and amusing games made the time fly very quickly and it was nearly midnight when the last party left. Dainty refreshments were served toward the close of the evening. Miss Sarah Ball was assisted in receiving her guests by her sister, Miss Adelaide Ball.

Those present at this delightful gathering were the Misses Bessie Valiant, Katherine Dwight, Sadie Howell, and Reta Pond, and Fred F. Taylor, Charles Dupee, Everett J. Peck, W. Kirby Dwight, Arthur Murphy, and William Townsend.

May Not Affect the Proposed Road.

It appears that although H. Close has filed a caveat against the opening of the new road from Dunellen to Bound Brook, it may not affect the opening of the road as seriously as thought at first, as the New Jersey Mutual Realty Company are interested in over a mile of frontage on the proposed road, and will open it up through their property as soon as their plans and the condition of the ground will permit. Should they do this, it is thought that other property-owners will do the same. The party who filed the caveat does not own any property along the proposed road and, it is said, his residence is over a quarter of a mile back from the present road, being reached by a lane.

STREET CAR AND WAGON COLLIDE.

The Driver of the Latter Was Turning Around and Didn't See the Car.

Car No. 6, of the street railway, and a milk wagon owned by C. E. Sage, of Washingtonville, came together Monmorning about 6 o'clock in front of the Arlington Hotel on Somerset street, and the result was disastrous to the milk wagon. The car was going towards the mountain, when Sage was making a turn in front of the hotel to go in the same direction. The repeated ringing of the gong did not have any effect, and in an instant the two came together. Both axles on the wagon were broken and 100 quarts of milk was allowed to escape. Fortunately there was no damage to Mr. Sage or his horse. Mr. Sage seemed to be very indignant, but it can hardly be claimed that the motorman was to blame, so it is said by those who saw the accident.

Winckler; representative to grand council, H. C. Adams; alternate, A. W. Bay; trustee, A. W. Kleinecke.

After the election two members were initiated in the good of the order, and there were speeches and songs and everybody had a pleasant time.

NOTABLE ACCOUNTANTS

SUCCESS OF A WELL-KNOWN PLAINFIELDER IN NEW YORK.

By Real Ability in His Line of Work, A. Stuart Patterson is Known as One of the Best of Accountants.

The banking and Law Journal for November contains a sketch of the firm Patterson & Corwin, expert accountants, New York, of whom Mr. Patterson resides and is well-known in this city. The Journal says:

In past numbers it has been our pleasure to note the growth of the professional body of accountants in the city of New York and their successful efforts in raising the standard of their profession; in the present article we shall devote brief space to a description of the members of a single firm of accountants, prominently identified with the profession in the city, Messrs Patterson & Corwin, of 30 Broad street, New York, composed of A. Stuart Patterson and Hamilton S. Corwin.

Some thirty-five years ago Mr. Patterson began his business career at a very early age, in the counting room of a great dry-goods jobbing house in New York, where he learned the rudiments of business and put in practice the theory of accounting which had been taught him in school. During those years, including several spent in St. Louis whence he was called as the representative of large vested interests, he was prominently identified with the accounting and financial departments of great manufacturing and commercial concerns, rising step by step until he became their chief executive officer. Some twelve years ago he returned to New York and entered upon the profession of accountancy to which he has since devoted his entire time and energies.

The business life of Mr. Corwin extends over a period of about 25 years. It began with a clerkship in a railroad office where was laid the foundation of his knowledge of detail. A few years later he became private secretary to the executive offiber of a large corporation then engaged in the concentration and consolidation of diversified manufacturing and transportation interests. In this connection he gained valuable experience in involved corporate affairs.

Later he became auditor and for several years devoted his time to the investigation and verification of the accounts of the allied interests of the of the corporation above referred to, and to simplifying and perfecting the accounts and establishing uniformity based on the best methods of modern accounting.

Mr. Corwin is an expert statistical and analytical accountant, and his long experience in reorganization and verification of details, executive experience and broad contact with affairs, fit him for the practice of professional accountancy.

About six years ago, Mr. Patterson and Mr. Corwin, who had been long been acquainted, formed the existing firm which, from the beginning, has had a large and increasing clientage.

By virtue of their different trainings and experiences Mr. Patterson devotes his attention more particularly to commercial and financial cases, while Mr. Corwin has achieved great reputation in manufacturing and railroad accounting, especially the latter.

IN MEMORIAM.

BY THEOPHILUS BOND.

John Y. Foster died Nov. 13th, 1896.

Not only underneath the red-cross shield
Do heroes lie,
And not alone upon the blood-stained field
Do patriots die.

For while we joy in peaceful victory won
For truth and right,
One who had long and faithful service done,
A stainless knight,

Who, at the front, not heeding toil or pain,
Did vigil keep,
Weary and broken with the strife, hath lain
Him down to sleep.

The Christian patriot we mourn today.
Who led our youth
By precept and example in the way
Of love and truth.

Whose feet unbidden, trod the pathway high
That leads to fame;
Who yet with soul and mind did magnify
His Master's name.

The ties of eloquence, the restless pen,
Are mute and still;
Let do they teach of love to God, to men
Peace and good will.

Weep not for him, his feet have only passed
Beyond the night;
His ravished eyes have seen the King at last
In glory bright.

And we, who loved him so, can only say
Farewell farewell;
A prince and a great man is fallen this day
In Israel."

BLOCKING THE WALK

COMMISSIONER MEEKER INTENDS TO HAVE AMPLE PASSAGE ENOUGH.

Complaints of One Merchant This Morning and the Latter Appears in City Court and Agrees Not to Block the Sidewalk.

Street Commissioner Meeker is on the warpath again. His raids are on the side of law and order, however, so its a good thing for the city. It is not the ashmen or the stone carters that are now encountering that hustling city official, but the merchants about town. Not all of them, of course, but the ones that are now obstructing the sidewalks with their goods. Many have complained about the way in which the sidewalk in the business section of the town are narrowed by some of the local dealers who pile the goods on the place designed for the pedestrians. Now that the holiday season has come and the increased crowd of shoppers wander from store to store every inch of space is needed to accomodate them. Many of the sidewalks are too small already and the inroads of the merchants has made locomotion difficult.

Street Commissioner Meeker started this morning on his raid and is determined to give the pedestrians all they belong to them and see that the city ordinance in regard to the matter is fully obeyed. He began this morning on West Front street. Ignatz Boehm was his first victim Mr. Boehm, it is alleged, has been encroaching on the sidewalk by exhibiting little chairs, doll's baby carriages and the like along the edge of the sidewalk. He has also, it is alleged, left large packing crates along the curb and unpacked them there. Mr. Meeker appeared before City Judge DeMeza this morning and swore out the warrant.

Mr. Boehm appeared before the Judge later in the morning and pleaded guilty. As soon as he understood the matter he willingly agreed to remove the goods at once and so the Judge suspended sentence.

WATER NOW FROM WELLS

Forty-six Have Been Driven in Swampy Lands to Supply Elizabeth.

The Elizabeth Water Company yesterday formally accepted from the contractors its new plant at the Hummocks, in Union Township, which will cost $200,000. There are forty-six driven wells ranging in depth from 250 to 280 feet. They are all in swamp land and about three miles from Elizabeth. These wells, by using pumps, can furnish a daily supply of 7,000,000 gallons of water, or about 3,000 000 gallons more than the present average daily supply. Joseph Leeds, of Stevens Institute, pronounces the water of excellent quality and s fe for domestic and boiler use.

The contract was made Jan. 15, 1896. Pipes will be laid to Elizabeth, where the water will empty into the Irvington avenue reservoir.

Sites for a City Hall.

A number of sites are being mentioned in connection with the city hall talk. The property of Charles H. Hand, at the corner of East Second street and Watchung avenue, is being pushed as the best place, owing to its being near the present fire headquarters and cheaper than a site on Front street would be. Other properties spoken of as desirable locations is that of J. Fred MacDonald at the corner of Front street and Watchung avenue, and also the property occupied by the boarding house of Mrs. MacDonald on East Front street, between Park and Watchung avenues.

Funeral of a Respected Woman.

Last week Tuesday, about noon, the wife of Rev. H. F. F. Schnellendruesseler, died at her home on Milton place, from an attack of pneumonia, after a brief illness, surrounded by her husband, daughter and Mrs. Cornelius Schenck, who had providentially been led to call at the house just at the hour of the spirit leaving the body.

The funeral services of the late Mrs H. F. F. Schnellendruesaler were held from the house on Milton place, Saturday afternoon. Prayer was offered by Rev. George Hauser, pastor of the German Reformed church, and the sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Todd, of Dunellen. The house was filled with friends and neighbors, who had learned to love and esteem the departed one. There were several floral pieces given by friends. Interment was in Hillside cemetery.

Married in New York.

There took place at noon on Thursday of last week, in Grace church, Chantry, New York, a quiet wedding, when Roger D. Lawrence, of Stelle avenue, this city, was united in matriage to Miss Lillian Burd, daughter of T. W. Burd, of Chantry. Only the immediate relatives of the bride and groom were present.

—The old ice house near the Wilson pond at Washingtonville has been torn down and a large gang of men is at work in the erection of a new and much larger one which is being built on the same location as the other. It will be finished in time for use this winter. It is being erected by the Plainfield Ice and Cold Storage Company.

GOING TO BE GOOD BOYS

SEVEN RASH YOUNGSTERS LINED UP IN FRONT OF THE CADI.

They Had Thrown Stones at a Well-Known Citizen. Besides Participating in Other Bad Conduct—Sentence Suspended.

Seven disconsolate, sorrowful-looking little boys marched up to the office of City Judge DeMeza Saturday with visions of striped uniforms, prison cells and other unpleasant things floating before their eyes. A score of other boys followed them sympathetically listening to their oft-told tale of woe. Horrible to relate, they had been arrested and were now coming up for trial.

These youthful offenders were arrested several days ago for using profane language and throwing stones at Col. Detreich. They were badly frightened at the result of their fun, but fairly owned up that they had been throwing stones, although not at the Colonel. One of the lads was very much worked up over the fact and begged the Judge not to send him to jail but to fine him, as then he could pay the fine and his parents wouldn't know. The tears came to the poor lad's eyes as he begged for clemency.

They were only playing, said the boys, and had no intention of throwing stones at anybody. They hadn't been using profane language either, they explained, not that day at least.

The Judge viewed them very sternly when they appeared before him this morning under the careful chaperonage of Chief Grant. He had held a consultation with the parents of several of the boys and with Col. Detreich before hand, and as the latter did not want to push the charge too hard, the Judge decided to suspend sentence, warning the lads that any complaint in the future for the same thing would go hard with them. They all promised never to do so any more and departed.

DEATH OF MRS. C. P. RALLI.

A Popular Plainfield Wife and Mother Passes Away.

A loving wife and a fond mother has been lost from the household of Constantine P. Ralli, of Netherwood. Sunday Mrs. Marion Gascoigne Ralli passed away at her home on Belvidere avenue after a short illness. Her death was caused by a complication of diseases. She had not been well all the summer, but it was not until Thursday night that she was taken seriously ill. She sank rapidly then and passed quietly away just before midnight.

She was the daughter of Samuel A. Haines formerly of Netherwood and now of Indianapolis, and was married to Mr. Ralli about six years ago at St. Stephen's church. Since then they have lived on Belvidere avenue, where two children, Pauline and Reginald, have been born to the household. Mrs. Ralli has been very active in the parish work at St. Stephen's church and her kindness and love are well known among many Plainfield families.

FOG CAUSED A WRECK.

Engineer Couldn't See That He Was Running Into Other Cars.

A coal train on the Jersey Central Railroad was run into by another one Monday morning at about 9 o'clock near the Bound Brook station. Six cars were smashed into Kindling wood by the collision, but luckily no one was hurt. The accident was caused by the dense fog that covered the tracks at that time, hiding the flagman of one train from sight until the other train was almost upon him. The switch was open and the moving train crashed into the other before the engineer had time to reverse the lever. When he saw that a collision was inevitable he jumped from the cab just as the engine struck the cars.

The wrecking train was sent for and soon arrived on the scene and cleared away the debris, so that the traffic on the road was but little delayed. Five of the large gondolas were completely wrecked, while others were slightly damaged.

Not the Horse Wanted.

Stonewall Jackson, of Martinville, who is a large dealer in all kind of horses, brought one of his animals to Plainfield on Friday for the purpose of selling him to the city for the fire department. The horse was placed by the side of the truck horse George, and proved to be a very even match for the latter. Yesterday afternoon the fire committee of the City Council inspected the horse at headquarters and decided that he was not the horse wanted. The committee is in no great hurry in purchasing horses for they want to get just the kind suitable for the work.

It Was Not a Fake.

If the editor of the News will take the trouble to see Mayor B. A. Hegeman, Jr., he will learn that the article published in the Daily Press on Friday night, regarding the opening of a fire hydrant in Prideville, was not a fake, and that the fire, water and lamps committee of the borough council did consider the matter and refer it to the Water Supply Company. The man who opened the hydrant is known and he will be obliged to repair the damage to the roadway.

WANT TO BE CANADIANS.

BOROUGH CITIZENS WHO ARE NOT IN FAVOR OF ANNEXATION.

Mayor Hegeman Says That He Cannot See Where the Borough Would Gain a Thing By Becoming a Part of the City.

To the casual observer there might seem to be many reasons why Plainfield and North Plainfield should be one, and the geographical lines dividing the two counties be erased, but there are those who have considered the matter below the surface and there views on the subject have no uncertain sound. Of late there has been said a great deal on the question of annexation and it looks as though it might be introduced in the Legislature this winter.

In view of this fact a representative of The Daily Press has sought the opinions of a few persons regarding the subject.

Among the first interviewed was Borough Mayor B. A. Hegeman, Jr., whose broad and liberal-minded views are well known. Mr. Hegeman did not, nor does he hesitate to say what he thinks about annexation. His opinion is "would it be a benefit to the borough? If so, to what extent?" A portion of his views are as follows:—"In proportion, the borough is progressing more rapidly than Plainfield and unless there are some better arguments advanced in favor of annexation, I am unalterably opposed to the scheme and the best, and really only potent reason advanced is that the children of the borough would have the advantages of the Plainfield schools without an additional expense, but as our own school has been advanced to a high standard, I see no reason why such an argument would stand.

"Another reason has been that we would have the benefit of the free library without an additional expense. I think, however, that those desiring books are willing to pay the small fee asked. At present we raise from $3,000 to $4,000 a year for our streets, and if we were annexed it is a question in my mind as to whether our streets would be as good as they are now. In such an event the borough would be divided into two wards at the most, with two representatives in the Council, and I think that we would fare worse by far than we do now, for we would have to take what the majority were willing to give, while our representatives in the minority could do but little. We seem to be better off than the city, for our indebtedness is very small, while in the city it is large and growing more so all the time. I do not want to appear as being antagonistic to the city, for I speak as a citizen and not as an office-holder. If there are any great advantages to be gained by annexation I have yet to hear of them. On the other hand I think that it would be a detriment to the borough in many ways. We would have to assume our portion of the city's debt, and while they would be obliged to be reciprocal and give us sewers, the increase would fall more heavily on the borough than on the city."

Another interested person interviewed was H. N. Spencer, of Somerset street. Mr. Spencer is strongly opposed to annexation and is not at all backward in saying so. He says that the borough can get along without the city and its indebtedness, and he can see no reason why the borough should be annexed. He thinks that the city should leave the borough alone.

Thomas Dowd, another active borough citizen, was asked for his opinion, and he was outspoken in his views. "I cannot see why the borough should be annexed, only to help Plainfield pay her indebtedness which is increasing rapidly. He thinks that the city is not as desirable as a residence place and that the borough's advantages are far greater than those in the city. He spoke of the many people who located in the borough in preference to the city, owing to the latter's indebtedness which drove them away. In every respect he can sidered the borough far superior to the city.

John H. French, of West Front street, said that the reason he was going to move in the borough was that Plainfield's debt was growing too fast and he thinks she will run the limit before long.

Risked His Life.

Every day there is a grand rush for the 7.58 train and commutor after commutor jumps on board the moving train at the risk of his life. This morning a young man tried to do the same thing but he slipped and fell almost under the car wheels. He retained his hold of the rail, however, and finally drew himself out of his dangerous position and on the train. Everybody that witnessed the fall expected to see him ground to pieces under the carwheels.

Pulpit Occupied by a Field Worker.

The pulpit at the Crescent Avenue church was occupied Sunday by L. D. Wishard, one of the leading field workers in the Y. M. C. A. In the morning he gave an interesting talk of his work in foreign fields, and at the evening service preached a powerful Gospel sermon.

ROUTED BY TURKEYS.

TRAMP HAS A ROUGH EXPERIENCE AT A PISCATAWAY FARM.

Entered the Turkey Yard and Attempted to Make Off With a Gobbler, When He Was Attacked by 22 of Them.

Joseph Huckins, who owns a poultry farm out in Piscatawaytown, tells with much gusto a story of how a tramp was routed by turkeys on his farm Friday. Huckins says that in all his experience in raising poultry he has never lost a turkey.

Yesterday afternoon he was sitting at a window in his house, when his son called his attention to a tramp crossing the field toward the turkey inclosure. The stranger went inside and immediately the gobblers became angry and mustered around him. He disregarded the signs of war, and stooping down grabbed the legs of the biggest and fattest of the lot. There was a flutter on the part of the captured gobbler, and the next second no tramp was to be seen. The other twenty-two gobblers had attacked him. Some of them grabbed him by the legs, and others flew upon his back and attacked his neck and face.

The tramp was game. He bolted for the gate, but clung to the captured bird. He had the full number of gobblers as company in his retreat, and they renewed their attack when they reached the open. One of them flew upon his shoulders and tore and scratched with his claws, while he pecked with his beak. The tramp dropped the captured bird and thus freed of his burden made better time, but the turkeys were mad and followed him.

The tramp was so frightened that he headed for the house and went past it, with the angry birds in pursuit. Some of them followed him down the road. Mr. Huckins declared solemnly that he had to wait a couple of hours before he dared to drive the birds back into their inclosure.

REV. DR. BARNES TO LEAVE.

But He Will Depart With Best of Feeling Between Parishioners and Himself.

In the working of the itinerancy of the Methodist Episcopal church, it will come to pass that very many changes of pastors will be made at the next session of the conference. The year following very few changes will be made, although this same performance of trying the keys there. By this time Mr. Arnold reached home, when his wife related the above story. He immediately called for a patrolman and Officer Flynn responded quickly. The two men made a search of the premises and house, but failed to find anyone, as the midnight prowler was evidently frightened away when Mr. Arnold arrived at his house.

BOLD ATTEMPT AT BURGLARY.

The House of William F. Arnold Visited by an Intruder Friday Night.

A bold attempt at burglary was committed early Saturday morning at the home of Cashier Wm. F. Arnold, of 817 Third place. Mr. Arnold remained at the new City National bank building rather late on Friday night, watching the progress of the work on the vaults, and when he reached home about one o'clock he found his wife much excited, and upon inquiry she told him what had happened just before he arrived. It seems that a man, unusually bold, had previously been trying several keys in an attempt to open the front door. Mrs. Arnold thinking at first that it was her husband, called to him, but the only reply she heard was "It's me." She then became frightened and illuminated the house throughout, hoping to scare the man away. This had but little effect, for he went to the back door, and through this the same performance of trying the keys there. By this time Mr. Arnold reached home, when his wife related the above story. He immediately called for a patrolman and Officer Flynn responded quickly. The two men made a search of the premises and house, but failed to find anyone, as the midnight prowler was evidently frightened away when Mr. Arnold arrived at his house.

Jack Daly Hurt.

John Daly, of this city, who is manager of Rich & Maeder's "Kidnapped" company, met with a serious accident while in Hartford Conn., last week, which will lay him up for awhile. A team of horses and a patrol wagon are used in the play, and one day Mr. Daly was on the wagon while the horses were being exercised about the city. Suddenly an axle broke, allowing the wagon to fall heavily to the ground. Mr. Daly was thrown out and his right leg severely injured, so that he is unable to get around except by the use of crutches. His many friends in this city will be pleased to learn that the accident was no worse, and they hope that he will speedily recover.

A Children's Party.

A charming children's birthday party was given Saturday afternoon by Inez Tolles, eleven-year old daughter of Councilman and Mrs. R. I. Tolles, of Orange street. The time was passed in dancing and playing games, after which the young guests were served with a bountiful collation. There were about thirty young people present and they all remembered the young hostess by giving her many valuable and pretty tokens in honor of the event.

Rev. Dr. W. R. Richards, pastor of the Crescent Avenue church, has gone to Berkshire Hills, Mass., where he hopes to recover from a severe attack of throat trouble.

HOUSE FOR THE FIREMEN

ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE PRIDEVILLE HOSE COMPANY ABOUT COMPLETED.

Lot on Harrison Street Purchased as a Site for the Building—Opened a Hydrant to Test the Bad Taste Out of the Water.

The Fire, Water and Lamp Committee of the Borough Council held an important meeting last Thursday at which time all arrangements were about completed for the erection of a hose building in Prideville, and the issuance of bonds as ordered by the Council It was reported that a lot had been purchased for $175 by the Committee on which the new building will be placed. The lot is located on Harrison street, just this side of Augustus Fiering's property. The owner of the property gives $25 toward macadamizing the street in front of the lot. It is quite likely that the work on the building will be started very soon. Another important matter was discussed by the Committee.

It was regarding a resident of Prideville who had opened a hydrant in that locality recently, and let the water run for a length of time. He committed the deed without the sanction of the committee. Investigation proved that the city water in the man's house had been tasting bad for sometime and he thought by opening a hydrant it would improve the taste of the water. The amount of water allowed to run out together with the heavy force had caused considerable damage to the roadway.

The committee did not know but what the Water Supply Company had given the man permission to run the water off, and if so the Company would be held responsible for the damage. If they had not given their permission the man will be obliged to stand the expense himself. The matter has been referred to the Water Company and the committee are now awaiting a reply before taking any action.

MISS WARING'S AT HOME.

A Charming Social Event at a Park Avenue Home Yesterday.

A charming social affair was the last "at home" given by Miss Florence Waring, of Park avenue, Thursday afternoon from 3 to 6 o'clock. Those who assisted Miss Waring in receiving were Mrs. J. W. Reinhart, Mrs. E. M. Van Buren, Mrs. A. C. Johnson, Mrs. F. H. Andrews, Mrs. A. C. A Marsh, Mrs. M. S. Ackerman, Mrs. Lawson, Mrs. Massett, Mrs. Howard Fleming, Mrs. L. G. Timpson, Miss Tweedy, Miss Cock, Miss Holly, Miss Smalley, Miss Andrews, Miss Lawson, Miss Harland, Miss Schoonmaker, of Plainfield, and Miss Weller, of Newburg-on-the-Hudson.

The decorations were especially attractive, and the prevailing color was red.

There were about 250 guests present during the stated hours.

Church Workers Hospitality.

At the regular monthly consistory meeting of the Elders and Deacons of Trinity Reformed church last Thursday at the residence of Elder Van Emburgh, East Second street, after the official business had been disposed of and adjournment was made, the brethren were the recipients of Mr. and Mrs. Van Emburgh's hospitality in the serving of delicious hot coffee and cake and a social chat.

Change in Business Location.

Several changes in business locations are soon to take place in the city. Schleif the West Fourth street baker, will take possession of the store on Park avenue, now occupied by B. R. Force, the shoe dealer, and the latter will take the floor on Front street, now occupied by John Berkaw, the shoe dealer, who is at present conducting an assignment sale.

A Family Quarrel.

Night before last the borough marshals were called to a residence near Greenbrook road, where a family quarrel was disturbing the neighborhood. When the marshals appeared quiet was resumed, and as no one made a complaint there was no arrests made.

New Officer for the Water Supply Co.

At a meeting of the Plainfield Water Supply Company, J. Frank Hubbard, of this city, was elected to fill the vacancy in the Board of Directors caused by the death of Elias R. Pope. Mr. Hubbard was also made secretary and treasurer of the company.

Trolley Cars Collide.

Car No. 11 of the street railway ran into car No. 6, at the corner of North and Watchung avenues, Thursday The only damage resulted to the fender. The cause of the accident is placed on the brake which refused to work.

—It has been suggested and perhaps reasonably, too, that the street lamps could have been more equitably distributed among the East Front street residents. For instance, in front of the John Taylor Johnston property, but on the opposite side of the street, there are six incandescent lamps burning at night, and only two of them are in front of or near improved property. For nearly a mile beyond to the east not a lamp is to be seen.

WHIPPED A MAN ANYWAY

WHETHER HE WAS THE RIGHT ONE THEY ARE NOT SURE.

New Brunswick Young Men Had Their Bicycle Tires Ruined in Plainfield, and They Set Out on a Trip of Revenge.

Arthur Harding and Wm. Meyers, of New Brunswick, tell a story of how they "got square" with a man who they allege cut the tires of their bicycles. On Tuesday evening they rode to this city and called upon a young lady living in West Fifth street. When they arrived they found the young lady talking to a man named Lyons, from East Orange.

Meyers was acquainted with the young lady, but his companion was not. After Harding had been introduced they were invited inside. The invitation did not include Lyons. He waited and left, looking displeased. He is a musician, and is known as the "Professor," because he plays music for dances.

The New Brunswick boys left their wheels in front of the house when they went inside. When their visit was over they found their tires flat, and an examination showed they had been punctured in several places with a penknife. Rightly or wrongly, they jumped to the conclusion that Lyons had cut them. After considerable hard work they patched up the punctures and started for home, but the repairs were only temporary, and very temporary at that, for instead of three quarters of an hour it took them three hours to get home, as they had often to stop to repair either one tire or the other.

They say they hired a tandem on Wednesday afternoon and rode to East Orange. They found where Lyons lived, but failed to find him at home. They hunted around until they discovered a man they took to be the one they were looking for. He was watching a game of football which some negroes were playing in an open lot. The boys say he denied he knew them or that his name was Lyons, but they were cocksure they were right and set upon him.

Harding is said to have hit him first, and then Meyers jumped into the fight. For either of the New Brunswick boys the man they attacked would have been a match, but he was unable to stand off both, and, according to their story, they used him pretty roughly. The dispute relative to the man's identity which preceded the fight had enlightened the crowd as to the reason of the attack, and the boys were cheered on in their work.

The boys say that after they finished with the East Orange man they rode home by way of Plainfield and told the young lady what they had done.

Found Dead on the Tracks.

As a train on the Central Railroad of New Jersey neared the Raritan station at 1 45 o'clock Thursday morning the engineer saw the body of a man lying on the eastbound track, near the end of the station platform. It proved to be that of James Lahey, twenty-five years old, who is well known in Raritan. Lahey's arm was broken and there was deep gashes in his forehead. It is believed that he attempted to jump from an east bound coal train passing through Raritan shortly after midnight, when his clothing caught on a bolt of the car and he was dragged the full length of the station platform. He was seen by his friends in Raritan at 6 o'clock Wednesday night. County Physician Wagoner pronounced it an accidental death.

A Profitable Affair.

The proceeds of the fair held in the old poorofficce building last week amounts to $115, which has been donated to the First Presbyterian church. The fair was given by the Advance Circle of King's Daughters. The thanks of the circle is extended to the following who were not mentioned in the previous article on the fair: E. W. Mills, manager of the United States Express Company, for cartage. A. M. Griffen, for the loan and fixing of a stove, and Will Tier for general services.

Had $15 Once, But Not Now.

Joseph Pole, a Polish farmer, was arrested Thursday by Marshal Hansen on Brook avenue. The man was very much intoxicated and had been causing considerable trouble in the above locality. This morning Justice Crosley gave the man ten days as he had no money to pay a fine of $10. The man claimed that he had $15 when he started out yesterday morning, but he had spent it all for drink.

Testimony in a Partition Suit.

Testimony was taken Thursday in the partition suit whereby partition is sought of the farm of the late John Smalley, near New Market, before Special Master of Chancery John H. VanWinckle at his office on West Front street. The complainant in the suit is Susan M. Dunham and the defendants are William H. Smalley and others.

A Good Likeness.

A fine three quarters life-size portrait of Professor Tyler, father of Col. M. W. Tyler, is on exhibition at the store of Philip Swain on East Front street. It is a splended piece of work.

IN CONFUCIUS' REALM.

A MISSIONARY TELLS OF HER WORK AMONG THE CHINESE.

Miss Ketring Explains the Customs of the Almond-eyed People—The Pitiable Condition of the Poor in That Great Country.

The trials and perils of missionary life in China were very vividly pictured by Miss Ketring, a returned missionary from that country, at the parlor meeting of the Home and Foreign Missionary societies of the First M. E. church, held in Vincent chapel, Thursday afternoon. Miss Matthews, superintendent of the Immigrant's Home at New York, was expected to come and talk on her experiences in the home mission field but she was unable to come. Miss Ketring, of New York, was present, however, and made a very interesting address, showing some of the idols and other queer curios from the land of the Chinaman. She told of the manners and customs of the Chinese and spoke about their idol worship. Her story of her own experiences while working among the natives were listened to with much interest and her description of the pitiable condition of the poor was very real.

There was a well rendered solo by Miss Margaretta Barnes, and the meeting ended with a little tea. Mrs. Edward Winter, president of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, presided over the meeting which was largely attended. The tea was poured by Mrs. Henry A. McGee and Mrs. J. R Joy.

LITERARY.

The Youth's Companion will celebrate its seventy-first birthday in 1897. Among the many attractive announcements of The Companion for the coming year is an article of exceptional value by Andrew Carnegie, on "The Habit of Thrift." Successful men in other walks of life will second Mr. Carnegie's paper with readable, practical articles based on their own experience, and valuable to the old as well as to the young. Stories will be given by Ian Maclaren, Rudyard Kipling, Stephen Crane, Harold Frederic and Clark Russell. Speaker Reed, Secretary Herbert, Senator Lodge, Hon. Carl Schurz, Postmaster-General Wilson, Dr. Lyman Abbott, Hon. Theodore Rossevelt. These are a few of the two hundred names that figure in the latest list of Companion contributors. New subscribers sending $1.75 to The Companion for 1897 will receive The Companion for the remainder of the year free, also the Companion's handsome four-color Calendar, and the paper a full year to January, 1898. Illustrated prospectus of the next volume will be sent free upon request. Address, The Youth's Companion, 205 Columbus Avenue, Boston, Mass.

An even excellence makes the good things which The Ladies' Home Journal promises unusually interesting and strong. The list is long and sturdy. One series of papers alone would sell the magazine; that is, the three White House articles which ex-President Harrison is to write. No man has ever done what General Harrison will do in these articles: show us what "A Day With the President at His Desk" means in one article; in another tell of "The Social Life of the President," and in a third article describe "Upstairs Life in the White House." Each of the articles will be profusely illustrated. Another series equally fascinating is the one called "Great Personal Events," in which some of the greatest enthusiasms which have occurred in America will be revived; those wonderful times when Louis Kossuth rode up Broadway; when the young Prince of Wales was here; when Jenny Lind sang in Castle Garden; when Henry Ward Beecher electrified his congregation by selling slaves in his pulpit; when Grant went round the world; when Henry Clay bade farewell to the senate; when John Wesley preached in Georgia, of which so few know. All these memorable events and others will be vividly recalled, told more graphically then ever before, and illustrated with pictures which have occupied twelve artists for over a year. A third series is unique and valuable from the fact that it will give women scores of ideas for their homes. It will reveal what there is "Inside of a Hundred American Homes," and carefully reproduce pictures of one hundred completely furnished rooms in homes in this country—from Maine to California—where taste has gone farther than money.

Settled the Bill.

The trouble between William Hand & Son and the Spratts Company has been settled. The car with its load of cages has been released from the custody of Constable Mattox and has left for its destination. When the owners of the cages which were attached learned of the attachment of their property Captain Hand quickly received his pay for the carting. The reason why it was not paid before, they explained, was on account of a misunderstanding.

—L. E. Hart, of West Front street, has just completed a rear addition to his house.

A PLEASING PROGRAMME.

ALL SOULS' CHURCH FESTIVAL.

An Interesting Programme Given at the Event Last Night.

The Christmas festival was continued at All Souls' Church Thursday. The sales were good and those who attended were greatly pleased with the affair. The pretty appearance of the room caused many complimentary remarks. Tonight will be the last night and special attractions will be offered.

The programme last evening consisted of a piano duet by the Misses Mary and Katie Graves, two songs by Herbert Brownell and Tom DeMeza, and a recital by Miss Mary Brown. For to-morrow evening the committee has arranged an entirely new entertainment. There will be a reading by Miss Ada Woolston and several selections on the violin by Miss Clyde Burnett, accompanied by Miss Marguerite Burnett on the piano.

Beating the Railroad Company.

Its as good as a ten cent show to watch the antics of the "Whit." Frazee at the depot these mornings. Right under the eyes of railroad detectives, merchants come up and hand him money and packages to take to New York, yet he takes passage on the 8 31 o'clock train without carrying a single bundle. Only a morning or two ago, it is said, a prominent North Plainfield policeman took several of Frazee's packages aboard the train with him, and transferred them at Jersey City.

Plainfield or Boston Artists?

James and Barry Burton, claiming to be colored song and dance men of Boston or Plainfield, were performing in an unlicensed manner on Main street Tuesday night, flourishing razors and scaring the audiences, when Marshal Anderson ran them in and Judge Brampton sent them up for 20 days.—Bound Brook Democarat.

Will Sue the Railroad Company.

Harry Willoughby, whose son William was struck by a train at the Central avenue crossing, Westfield, Tuesday, has engaged a lawyer and will bring suit against the railroad company for $1,000 damages for loss of horse and wagon and injuries to his son.

—The new extension of Sycamore avenue has been graded and it presents a fine appearance from Front street.

UNDER A MARRIAGE BELL

MISS MARGARET CODDINGTON BECOMES THE WIFE OF IRA GRAMLEY.

The Ceremony Performed at the Home of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph H. Krewson, by the Rev. Dr. C. R. Barnes.

It was, indeed, a very pretty home wedding that was celebrated Thursday at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph H. Krewson, 469 West Front street, when their niece, Miss Margaret A. Coddington, was united in marriage to Ira Gramley, of Kaneville, Illinois. The ceremony was performed by Rev. C. R. Barnes, pastor of the brides' church in the presence of about forty friends and relatives. The rooms were prettily decorated with evergreens and roses, while the parlor presented the most attractive appearance. In one corner was arranged a bower of evergreens, suspended from which was a beautiful marriage bell, under which the bridal party stood. The ceremony took place at 6 30.

The bridemaid, Miss Jennie Brokaw, richly gowned in pink silk, rimmed with pink, satin preceded the party. She was followed by the bride, exquisitely gowned in white albatross, trimmed with white satin, who entered the room leaning on the arm of her father, Job Coddington, who gave his daughter away in marriage. The groom and best man, Winfield C. Coddington, brother of the bride, entered the parlor from the hallway, and met the others beneath the marriage bell. The marriage was performed with a ring. Both the bride and bridemaid carried white and pink roses.

Following the ceremony the happy couple were showered with congratulations by their friends.

The guests then adjourned to another room where a sumptuous wedding supper was served. The table was laiden with all the good things of the season and the decorations were very fine.

The bride and groom were the recipients of a large collection of useful and ornamental presents.

In a few days Mr. and Mrs Gramley will leave town and visit friends in various New Jersey towns, after which they will go to Centre county, Pa., to spend several weeks. From there they will go to Kaneville, Ill., where they will reside. At the latter place Mr. Gramley has a large and productive farm.

The bride is well-known in this vicinity, and is an accomplished and highly esteemed young woman. Her many friends wish both her and her husband a bright and prosperous journey though life.

AN OLD OFFICER RETIRES.

Annual Meeting and Election of Officers of A. O. H. Last Night.

The annual meeting of the A. O. W. was held Thursday and the following officers elected for the ensuing year: President, Edward Risingham; vice-president, Edward Ryan; secretary, William McCarty; financial secretary, Peter W. McDonough; treasurer, Michael Nugent; sergeant-at-arms, William Casey. The installation of officers will take place at the January meeting, at which time P. Casey will have rounded out his twenty-fourth year of service as an officer in the organization and will retire with honors. A smoker will also mark the occasion. At the meeting last night five new members were initiated. The organization is in a very prosperous condition.

Not the Right Sort of Cartridges.

It seems proper and fitting that, inasmuch as certain reports have been circulated to the effect that the police of the city are not thoroughly up-to-date in the use of their revolvers, that those in charge be delegated to give a few lessons. The latest report is that one of the policemen was trying to shoot a dog a few nights ago, and after repeated attempts with no result, the officer learned that he had a rim-fire revolver in which he was using centre fire cartridges.

Jerusalem Chapter Election.

The following officers were elected at the meeting of Jerusalem Chapter, No. 24, R. A. M., last Thursday:—High Priest, D. C. Adams; King, C. C. Howard; Scribe, Walter A. Freeman; Captain of Host, Clarence Goss; Principal Sojourner, Robert A. Meeker; Junior Deacon, Edward Nelson: Trustees, John Chandler, John Odam; Secretary, Frank Coriell; Treasurer, Henry Liefke.

Small Boys Got the Best of Them.

Chief Giles and several of the members of the Dunellen Fire Department piled up a lot of boards and soaked them with kerosene on the property bought by Harry Terry on the New Market road. Saturday night the firemen were going to set fire to them and try their new alarm and also see how quick they could put out a bon-fire. But the small boys in that vicinity could not wait for to morrow night, so they touched them off last night and the fire laddies did not respond as they were too mad to work. The chief is looking for the boys that set the boards on fire.

TO STOP ABUSE OF ALMS

THAT IS THE IDEA OF THE ORGANIZED AID ASSOCIATION.

The Annual Meeting of the Organization Held Last Evening and Very Encouraging Reports Heard For the Year.

The attendance at the annual meeting of the Charity Organized Aid Association, held last Thursday in the chapel of the Crescent Avenue church, was unusually large. President Tyler was in the chair and in the opening of the meeting gave a brief outline of the work done by the Association. In his remarks he stated that heretofore there had been a lack of co-operation on the part of the churches and other charity organizations in the city. He urged that this matter be closely investigated and that all organizations strive toward a co-operation which would produce the best results. He said the Association was organized for the purpose of assisting other organizations so that charity would not be duplicated or abused.

The first business of the evening was the presentation of reports, and H. P. Reynolds, as treasurer, was called on first. His report showed that the Association has a membership of 145, consisting of persons who give $1 or more a year. From this source $448 had been received. Direct contributions amounting to $225 had also been received. The total receipts for the year were reported to be $700. On the side of expenditure the amount of $652.87 was used. On November 16th there was a balance of $63.87 in the treasurer and all bills were then paid. At present there is a balance of $16.17 with a few unpaid bills.

W. McCutchen, chairman of the finance committee, stated that during the past thirteen months the operating expenses of the Association had been $650.. There were 142 membes who gave $2; fifteen gave $5; fourteen gave $10; three $75; one $50 and one $100; He urged more hearty co-operation on the part of all.

For the district committee, Rev. G. Kennedy Newell, chairman, reported that during the past three years 467 cases had been considered, and during the past year there were 121 new cases, and of the above number 350 persons had been helped.

He stated that the advice of the Association had been sought by every charity organization in town and by seven out-of-town organizations and in every instance the advice given had been followed. He also stated that through the efforts of the Overseer of the Poor, ten persons had been taken off of the city poor list and three added. Mrs. Woodruff, the agent, had made, during the year, 300 calls and had written 238 letters. Mr. Newell praised Mrs. Woodruff and H. B. Newhall for their conscientious and faithful work.

W. L. Saunders, chairman of the printing and publishing committee, reported that $50.45 had been expended in that department during the year. He suggested that hereafter the chairman of his committee be selected of the district committee.

Mrs. H. B. Opdyke, as chairman of the employment bureau, presented an excellent report. She said that three classes of people had been dealt with. First, the faithful and efficient; second, unfaithful, without good references; third, those who were lazy and vicious. She stated that a woodyard was in operation, and she asked those present to order their wood through the committee. This she said would not affect other dealers in wood, as the coal merchants about town had informed her that there was very little profit in wood.

All reports were received and on a motion they were referred to the printing and publishing committee, for the purpose of having them printed.

At this time Miss Luella Harris, soprano soloist at the First Baptist church, rendered a beautiful solo, and the audience appreciated her rich, cultivated voice.

Mr. Tyler then introduced General Wager Swayne, of New York, who delivered the address of the evening. Gen. Swayne is identified with charity work in New York, and his remarks were based on experience.

Among other things he said: "There should be a co-operation in the work as a promotive of truth. That which prevents a man, not an object of charity, from becoming one, is doing a good work, for this is a most important matter, and don't leave a person in such a condition that they will prefer to become dependent upon charity."

During Gen. Swayne's remarks he cited many incidents in connection with his work, and he gave much good advice to the members present. His remarks were thoroughly enjoyed. In conclusion, Miss Harris again favored the audience with a pleasing selection. A vote of thanks was then tendered both to Gen. Swayne and Miss Harris for their services.

Before the meeting adjourned the following officers were re-elected for the ensuing year: President, Mason W. Tyler; vice-presidents, H. B. Newhall, Mrs. H. B. Opdyke, Alexander Gilbert; secretary, J. Doul Miller; treasurer, H. P. Reynolds.

The Constitutionalist.

A DEMOCRATIC WEEKLY.

PUBLISHED AT

PLAINFIELD, N. J.

Terms—$2.00 per year.

A. L. Force, Editor and Proprietor

The first newspaper almanac to make its appearance is the one issued by the Philadelphia Record. It is brimful of useful information.

One of the annual features of holiday life in Plainfield is The Press calendar, issued on New Year's day. It is a dandy this time, and no mistake.

The little folks are expectant and wondering, the big folks perplexed and contriving about gifts. And yet the stores are jammed full of nice things.

The Press advertisers are representative merchants in their respective lines of business, and you can spend your Christmas money with them without fear of being duped.

Major Z. K. Pangborn, formerly editor of the Jersey City Journal, and well known to many Plainfielders, is being talked of as a Mayoralty candidate by the Republicans of Jersey City.

Senator elect Reed certainly advances some strong and practical arguments in the matter of city and borough consolidation, in the interview published in another column of today's Press.

For six years Mayor Gilbert has served the city well and faithfully as its chief executive, and the testimonial dinner to be tendered him at the close of his official life in the city is eminently proper.

The question of building a new city hall for Plainfield is being agitated. Plainfield, with its growing proposi tion, richly deserves a suitable building wherein to transact its municipal business.—Elizabeth Contractor.

The proposition that the incoming Legislature appropriate $25,000 to pay the expenses of the National Guard of New Jersey as an escort of Garret A. Hobart to the inaugural ceremonies in Washington, is not in the line of economy.

Charles J. Baxter, State Superintendent of Public Schools, who makes his home in this city, has proven to be the right man in the right place, though a year ago when he was appointed to the position there were some expressions of surprise because of his not having a State reputation.

After three weeks of testimony, export and otherwise, and newspapers filled with disgusting illustrations of its different features, the murder trial of Maria Barberi ends with an acquittal. This ignorant and unfortunate specimen of the slums of the metropolis will now dissolve from public view much quicker than she came into prominence.

There is nothing ambiguous in the views of several of North Plainfield's prominent citizens on the question of borough and city consolidation, which are published in the news columns of today's Press. Though such a consummation may come at sometime, it is evident that there is a very strong spirit against it at present. From time to time The Press will print interviews with other prominent Plainfielders, both in city and borough, anent this same subject.

The announcement made in Monday's Press that Rev. C. R. Barnes, D. D., is to relinquish the pastorate of the First Methodist church next spring, will be received with regret by the church people of this city, where, during his stay of five years, he has endeared himself in both social and religious circles. His removal, however, will not be the result of any difference between pastor and church, but because of the rules of the church applied to all pastorates.

A bill is also, in prospect, but one which will probably not become a law, providing for the payment of all fees now collected by the county officers into the county treasury, and for these officers to be paid a fair salary for their services. The office of Sheriff in first-class counties is estimated to be worth $25,000; that of County Clerk, $20 000; Surrogate, $15,000. In second class counties the office of Sheriff is worth $12,000; County Clerk, $8,000; Surrogate, $6,000. It is estimate that if all the fees were put into the county treasury and these officers paid a salary, from $40,000 to $50 000 would be saved to the taxpayers in first-class counties, and a proportionate sum in second class counties. It is apparent that these proposed reforms would be directly in the interest of taxpayers, because taxes go principally for municipal expenses.—Somerville Unionist-Gazette.

COMETS AND METEORS.

At the close of the lecture Mr. Prentiss exhibited some specimens of meteoric stones, and the usual conversation class was held. There will be no more lectures until January 12, when the first lecture on "Vital Forces in Modern History" will be delivered by Dr. James F. Biggs. On Tuesday of next week, however, at 7.30 p. m., there will be held an examination, in which the astronomy students are invited to test their knowledge. The successful ones will receive a diploma.

A PRACTICAL SYSTEM.

An entirely new system of grading scholars has been adopted in Elizabeth schools that is rich with a practical conception of school work. It is the appliance of a method whereby those who learn rapidly may not be retarded by those who are not so quick to grasp the instructions, and yet at certain periods are in the same grade. Under the old system ever, those who were capable of being advanced at an early period from grammar to high school, were obliged to wait till the end of the school year in June, when, with those who had learned more slowly, they were advanced. By this new method, however, the brighter pupils are transferred from the grammar to the high school as soon as they are able to pass the examinations, thus receiving the benefit of individual rather than average class work, and shortening the time they will be obliged to devote to master the curriculum of studies. The most popular feature of the system, but by no means the most important, will doubtless be the saving of money to the taxpayers. The children will make more rapid progress, and as it costs less to teach three years than it does to teach five, the money will go just so much further in carrying on the public schools.

PLAINFIELD AHEAD OF NEWARK.

Now it is Plainfield that is talking about building a new city City Hall. Meanwhile Newark, the premier city of the State, appears satisfied with the old ramshackle hostelry in which the municipal business is done.—Tribune.

New Jersey has 1,763 public school buildings. The past year thirty eight buildings have been erected and sixty-five enlarged.

Though Joseph H. Choate, the eminent New York lawyer, has won all kinds of lawsuits in the face of all kinds of law, he had to condescend to paying a $1 fine in a police court yesterday because the lamps on his carriage were not lighted. Such is fate.

Mayor elect Fisk, of Plainfield, would do well to heed the request of the Woman's Improvement Association that two women shall be appointed as members of the Board of Health. It will be healthier for him and all the rest of Plainfield when such representation is allowed.—New York Press.

After all, the Elizabeth shouters are not sure that they can "do" everything in the sporting line from Plainfield; but they are willing to try it, says the Journal. Not always, though, for in Elizabeth sports there is something akin to caste, and the cock-a-lorums of the county seat oftimes regard Plainfield's representatives with a patronizing spirit, as if to say, "Oh, you are not in our class so why bother with you." But way back of our modest standing we have the the sinews of war, and if we ever get after some of those much-vaunted Elizabeth crack-a-jacks we'll show them that we stand pretty well up in all classes; and in some we are at the top, as they have reason to know.

Jack Frost heralded the Storm King in a biting manner.

Governor Griggs Tuesday reappointed Dr. Franklin Gaunt, of Burlington, as a member of the State Board of Health.

The big New York papers are now straining efforts to see how much self-glory they can gain by the breaking of the gas monopoly.

In the weather lore of "the oldest inhabitant" a real winter does not come till December 21st. Thus we see that we are five days ahead of time this year.

A renewal of bonds in New Brunswick brought a premium of 5 18 per cent. with interest at 4½ per cent. Plainfield bonds are much more desirable than those of New Brunswick.

President Cleveland Tuesday sent to the Senate the nomination of William J. Whelan as postmaster at Elizabeth. Mr. Whelan has been serving under a recess appointment since the death of Patrick Sheridan.

Judge VanSyckel, of the Union Circuit Court, will resume the practice of law on his retirement from the bench. There are probably ten able lawyers in Elizabeth who already believe that they will succeed Judge VanSyckel.—New York Press.

To Kill Thistles

It is not necessary to kill all the seeds of the thistles in order to exterminate these undesirable weeds. You can so cultivate the ground that they will not thrive; and at last will disappear altogether. It might be better to kill the seeds, but we cannot do it. It would be the wisest course to destroy all the germs, or seeds, of consumption, could we do so. But this cannot be done. So we must keep the tissues of the lungs, the soil, in such a condition that the germs will not thrive the

A Superbly Appointed Train.

Undoubtedly the handsomest train between Chicago and St. Paul, Minneapolis, the Superiors and Duluth, is the "North-Western Limited," which leaves Chicago at 6:30 p. m., daily, via the North-Western Line (Chicago & North-Western R'y). Its equipment, which is entirely new through out, and embraces Compartment Sleeping Cars, Buffet Smoking and Library Cars, standard Sleeping Cars and Ladies Coaches, has every luxury which imagination can conceive or mind invent for the convenience of passengers. General L. F. Cuby; Assistant Attorney-General under President Harrison's administration, is fired with zeal in the Cuban cause of independence and the fighting ability of the Yankee soldier. General says that if he could only get backing for the expenses of organizing an army of 10,000 American men, he could visit Cuba and end General Weyler's reign of butchery in short order.

Says the Plainfield Press: "Charles J. Baxter, State Superintendent of Public schools, who makes his home in this city has proven to be the right man in the right place, though a year ago when he was appointed to the position there were some expressions of surprise because of his not having a State reputation." There is a great deal of truth in the statement. Mr. Baxter seems to have given eminent satisfaction to all who have watched his endeavors to promote the interests of the State schools. It was feared that Mr. Boland's place would hardly be filled, but Mr. Baxter has made manifest his abundant qualification to fill the position to the State's advantage.—Elizabeth Journal.

Germania Beneficial Society Enjoy a Pleasant Time.

The Germania Beneficial Society held a very successful dance in Sangerbund Hall Monday night. The dance was well attended and proved a pleasant affair to the participants. The attendance was good. M. Mensingbach was the president of the committee that arranged the dance and Otto Keller was the secretary of the committee; Joseph Haurand assisted. The floor manager was Charles Fizuhen. P. Pfistler was in charge of the door while Vincent Wisnlewski presided over the box office. Fred Conde and Henry Ruppert were the committee on refreshments which were served during the evening.

Dissatisfied With the Sale.

Considerable dissatisfaction exists among some of the members of the Independent Gun Club over the sale of the Dunellen club-house to Mr. Day. It is alleged that the sale was made without the knowledge or consent of the members and without even calling a meeting to consider the matter. It is quite likely that an attachment will be served on the purchaser and the building held until some adjustment can be made.

New Officers for the Year.

At a regular communication of Stone Square Lodge, No. 38, F. and A. M., held Monday night the following officers were elected: Master, James Walker; senior warden, M. J. A Story of Shakspere's Time.

"MASTER SKYLARK,"

BY JOHN BENNETT.

Illustrated by Birch.

This is a live story, full of action, color, merriment, and human nature. The world's greatest poet figures as one of the principal characters, while the hero and heroine are a boy and girl. It is poetic in treatment, but full of romance and the Elizabethan age, and very dramatic in plot. Another serial, beginning in November is

A Great War Story for North and South.

"THE LAST THREE SOLDIERS,"

BY WILLIAM H. SHELTON. A strong story with a unique plot. Three Union soldiers, members of a signal corps stationed on a mountain top, cut a bridge that connects them with the rest of the world, and become veritable castaways in the midst of the Confederacy. Will be filled with delight by children North and south.

A Serial For Girls.

"JUMBO JAUNDICE" by MARION HILL, is another strong story, especially suited to the favorite writer. It is full of fun, the character creating the name, and the influences of the story is inspiring and uplifting.

SHORT STORIES.

There will be many tales of brave effort and adventure. GEORGE KEN'N has written three exciting stories of his experiences in Russia; MALCOLM CAMP will have a thrilling story of a bicycle race, and J. T. TROWBRIDGE will contribute a story of the sea. Every month will have articles representing 1897.

Colored Supplement with the Semi-Weekly.

There is a place in the United States for a weekly of really high intellectual quality, and the American people have given the NEW YORK TRIBUNE a lavish welcome. During the past year THE WEEKLY was taken in over 2,500 families and re d by about 1,200,000 people. Every effort will be made to brighten and enrich the paper and make it necessary to thousands of ne friends.

Fairness, self-respecting, coöperating THE TRIBUNE is fearless and sub-fairly in editorial comment on public affairs, standing on principles, and not whirled about with every gust of popular caprice. It exhibits in every issue the true American qualities of quickness, directness, brilliancy and force. It has won from Democratic readers the thoroughly American spirit, the animation that is necessary to make the re-port of an parties. In directing attention early and jointly, to the availability of McKinley and Hobart for the Republican nominations in 1896, THE TRIBUNE showed once more its well known and important part.

THE WEEKLY TRIBUNE ministers to all the sweet and wholesome in sense of life; and it is distinctly a paper for families and for those who want the spirit and the editorials of the leading I epublican paper of the United States. It has an excellent Agricultural page, a page of Science and Mechanics a charming page especially for women, a strong array of market reports of unusual fulness and exactness, foreign letters, and bright sel-ections, in addition to the news of the week.

It can usually be subscribed for with local county weeklies. Sample copies free.

THE SEMI-WEEKLY TRIBUNE comes on Tuesday and Friday, and gives twice as much matter as The Weekly.

The craving for color on the part of the young and even of other members of a family, has been recognized by THE SEMI-WEEKLY TRIBUNE in the publication of a colored supplement of pictures, with each Friday's paper. If not gratified in a proper way, the instinct for pictures and for bright reading matter will in-line many to seek in less desirable publications that which they cannot find in their favorite papers. Stories and quaint paragraphs, and the gifty and now political cartoons, humorous sketches and half tones, and many other amusing contents of the colored supplement will prove a welcome addition to the wiser and weightier parts of the paper. It is printed on superfine paper, and the 16 pages of pictures and reading with the price of the SEMI-WEEKLY TRIBUNE, $1 per year, as well as its political views.

"Prinkles" is really a picture book, and the course of a year the reader will receive more than he has ever found in a book costing $1.50. The important popularity of the supplement will lead to new value for bound volumes and each copy valuable long after the date of publication.

This edition is not offered in combination with local weeklies. The colored supplement will be sent on Fri ay subscriptions, who forward the regular price of the SEMI-WEEKLY, $1.00 a year, to THE TRIBUNE direct.

Sample copies of Friday's SEMI-WEEKLY free.

FATHER AND SON FIGHT

THE LATTER JUST OUT OF JAIL, GOES BACK AGAIN.

The Two Men Disagreed and Retired to the Upper Story of Their House to Settle Differences—Blood Flowed Freely.

Roundsman Mattox has visited the scene of many a racket, but he says that he never saw a worse looking place than the one he was called to Sunday afternoon to put an end to a family scrap that was disturbing the whole neighborhood. The trouble was at the home of John Dorgan, of Plainfield avenue, between Fourth and Fifth streets.

The Roundsman was on duty yesterday as usual, covering the city on his wheel. He was told that there was a family row going on at the home of the Dorgans, and so he started to investigate. The inmates were all peaceful when he arrived, but the house showed many signs of a previous lively time. The window sashes had been knocked out, and in the house the chairs and tables were overturned and smashed.

John Dorgan, Jr., better known as Jack, was claimed to be the cause of the fracas. He had returned Saturday after serving a term in the county jail for drunken-ess, but he had stopped when the officer approached. Mrs. Dorgan refused to let the officer in and informed him, in language more forcible than polite, that characters of his style were not wanted. The doors and windows were locked, so the Roundsman rode away.

He didn't stay long, however, and succeed to find the son at home again. Jack told the policeman to go to a place where it was considerably warmer, for he wouldn't go in there. John Dorgan, Sr., disagreed with his son at that remark and told him that he was going to be arrested. Father and son immediately adjourned to the upper story to settle their differences while Mrs. Dorgan waited below.

The Senior Dorgan said in the city court Monday that he laid down on the bed and his son jumped on him and started to thrash him. At any rate a lively fight ensued between father and son, the sounds of which could be heard by Mattox and a large crowd that had assembled outside to see the fun. Mrs. Dorgan heard the noise and finally rushed up stairs screaming "Murder! Police!" at the top of her voice. The Roundsman waited no longer but kicked open the door and pushed away the things with which Jack had tried to barricade the door. Then he rushed up stairs to find the two men struggling on the bed, both of them covered with blood, while the mother and wife took a hand in the conflict from the coastide.

Mattox pulled the son away and then the latter, half blinded with blood, turned on the officer and strug gled fiercely in his grasp. After a lively resistance, Jack Jr. was landed in the yard and finally conveyed to the lock-up.

This morning he was arraigned before City Judge DeMeza. He pleaded guilty and the Judge gave him his choice between a fine of $20 and 60 days in jail. His finances was low and he was taken down the road to Elizabeth. The elderly couple also appeared, but they pleaded not guilty and laid all the blame for the trouble on their son who, they say, was wild with drink. They declare that they were both sober while Mattox testifies that they were under the influence of liquor. Their trial was set for Saturday morning.

Charming Christmas Gifts.

There are few things that add to the comfort of a home as a good lamp. To insure getting the best obtainable, both from an artistic and practicable standpoint, buy the "Miller" lamp, manufactured by Edward Miller & Co., 25 and 30 West Broadway, between Park place and Barclay streets, New York. Miller & Co. are the oldest and largest manufacturers of lamps.

SOMERSET WANTS CITY.

SENATOR-ELECT REED ADVISES CITY TO LEAVE UNION COUNTY.

That is How Mr. Reed Would Accomplish the Consolidation of City and Borough—Talks of a New County

The question of the consolidation of the city of Plainfield and the borough of North Plainfield is becoming generally discussed now that the opening of the session of the Legislature is near at hand. There is considerable talk on the question and the matter is likely to be brought to the attention of the Legislators at Trenton very soon. The opinions of many of the leading citizens as published in Saturday's Daily Press attracted much attention among the residents of both city and borough, and the interest in the subject seems to be growing.

To many, the joining of the city and borough in one large city means the annexation of North Plainfield to Plainfield and its consequent addition to Union county. Comparatively few realize that the arguments in favor of the annexation of Plainfield to the borough and its change from Union to Somerset county are very strong. Then there is also the suggested plan of forming a new county of the city and borough and the surrounding country, new comprising portions of Union, Middlesex and Somerset counties.

North Plainfield has no better known citizen than Senator Charles A. Reed and no one is better acquainted with the position North Plainfield holds in relation to the other parts of the county, and to the neighboring counties, than he. Senator Reed was interviewed Saturday afternoon by a Press reporter regarding his opinion on the annexation question. Mr. Reed said that he had not studied up the subject to any extent as would be necessary before giving a careful statement of the question, but he consented to give a few ideas on the subject.

The Legislature, he said, would never allow such a large part of a small county to be added to a much larger county, and he thought from the point of view of a citizen of the borough that the annexation of North Plainfield to Plainfield would not be at all beneficial to their interests. While he did not think any change necessary, the only action that he would support would be the union of the two places in one city to be located in Somerset. The formation of a new county, was, he said, feasable, but he doubted if it ever could be accomplished. It would give an additional member to the Senate, which would disturb the balance of power between North and South Jersey.

He then went on to speak more at length on the different phases of the problem. Plainfield, he said, would gain materially by the annexation of the borough. The present tax rate which is higher than the rate in North Plainfield would be reduced somewhat by the addition of the taxable property of the borough. The new rate would be higher for North Plainfield than its present one as the county tax in Union county is higher than the tax in Somerset. While it would do away with the salaries of certain officials that are now duplicated in city and borough, the new officials would have more work to do and would consequently have increased salaries. The combined fire and police departments would not be reduced but this is another expense. The only advantage to be gained by North Plainfield, continued Mr. Reed, in coming into Union county is a sentimental one. The mayor wouldn't have to explain that he wasn't mayor of Plainfield but only of the little borough of North Plainfield. Then it would give a larger town and there a sentiment in favor of size. North Plainfield would lose the power of self government, she would not be able to say how much money shall be raised and how it shall be spent, instead the power would be with the majority on the other side of the brook. Altogether North Plainfield would be less independent by uniting with Plainfield. "I think," said Mr. Reed, "if the matter were put to a vote in North Plainfield, there would be a considerable majority against it."

There are some additional advantages, continued the Senator, to be derived from consolidation should Plainfield come into Somerset county besides those which would be gained in say event. The tax rate would be considerably lowered in Plainfield on account of the lower county tax in Somerset.

At present, Plainfield is dominated by Elizabeth and the rest of Union county. She is the second in size and importance in the county, and would be in event of annexation, while in Somerset county she would be the factor of first importance in the county; she would hold the same attitude in Somerset that Elizabeth does in Union.

There would, of course, be opposition by either county in the event of transferring part of that county into another, but the opposition of Somerset would be more reasonable. Senator Reed then picked up his Legislative Manual for 1896, and looked over the figures of the census for 1895. The population of Somerset county is given as 30,317, and that of Union county as 95 404 North Plainfield's population is 4,879 and Plainfield 13,628. They never cut down little counties, remarked Mr. Reed, to give population to larger ones, that makes disparagement all the greater. The Legislature has said, in other cases, that that is a step in the wrong direction; they should try to equalize the population of the counties.

People seem to think, continued the Senator, that Union county's opposition would be all powerful. Union has no more voice in the Senate than Somerset and its representation in the House is not much more.

"I am of the opinion," declared the Senator, "that North Plainfield could not be brought out of Somerset county." The other plan, he continued, might be accomplished after much opposition. The Legislature is a political body and the political aspect would appeal to the legislators more. From past experience I think think that they would only favor the change by equalizing the counties.

Then there would be great opposition to a new county. North and South Jersey are somewhat jealous of each other in the representation in the Senate. South Jersey would oppose the formation of a new county in North Jersey with all her might. A new county is expensive and it is questionable whether we want it. There would be county officers, the buildings and machinery, which costs money to acquire and maintain, with doubtful, if any, advantage.

What should be done, continued Senator Reed, if any change is to be made, is to take Plainfield and the portion of Middlesex county that naturally comes to the Jersey Central railroad and add it to Somerset county, and the part of Somerset county, which lies in close proximity to New Brunswick, to be given to Middlesex county in exchange.

Then Mr. Reed explained that the part of Middlesex county including Dunellen, New Market and the surrounding neighborhood naturally turns toward the Jersey Central as a means of communication and transportation while the route to the county seat, New Brunswick, is long and difficult. Then a point of Somerset county extends up close to New Brunswick and naturally turns toward that city as an outlet. A line drawn from the south-eastern corner of Plainfield to the Bound Brook dam and then across country to the present boundry line beyond New Brunswick, would effect the exchange of these two sections, which are about equal in size and population to the addition of Plainfield to Somerset county. The union of the city and the borough would follow as a matter of course.

"The people who are stirring up the question of annexation in the borough," said the Senator, "want to go over to Union County. If they want annexation, and I don't see any special need of it myself, they will have to come to Somerset county." Such is Senator Reed's opinion as regards annexation.

CHAPTER XIV.

AT a bad beginning presages a good ending, the two amateur company promoters ought to have done well pleased, but, such is the inconsistency of human nature, they were not. Wentworth was the least depressed by the ominous start, although he admitted that the letter received from the manager of the china manufactory asserting that the spar shown to him was of no particular value, was a serious setback. Kenyon maintained that Melville and Braud, his manager, or the works, were either ignorant or falsifiers of fact. The mineral, he insisted, was all that he claimed it to be.

"I hardly see how that helps us," said Wentworth. "They can't be ignorant, for they know how to make china, while we don't. On the other hand, why should they lie to us? What object could they have in not telling the truth?"

That was a question that John was not prepared to answer, so, being a sensible man, he remained silent.

When he read Edith Longworth's letter he felt more encouraged, and, in due time, William Longworth himself wrote, asking for an appointment, saying he had considered the matter, and, if satisfactory arrangements could be made, he would be glad to assist them in forming a company.

When the three young men met in Wentworth's office, Longworth appeared to have become reasonably enthusiastic about the project, but assured them that a company could not be formed in the economical manner they had intended. Much depended on appearances in the city; handsome offices would be considered the better, and, if satisfactory arrangements could be made, he would be glad to assist them in advertising to be done.

Kenyon pointed out that all this required time and money, both of which requisites were short.

"We are making a strike for £60,000 each," said Longworth, calmly, focusing his glittering monocle on Kenyon "That sum of money is not picked up in London every day, and it is never picked up anywhere without taking a little risk. If you economize on your spirit you will not catch your gudgeon."

"But yve haven't the money to risk," persisted Kenyon.

"Then, dear sir," said Longworth, "cease to fish for gudgeon, and return to the highly respectable profession of mining engineering. If I am going to join you I can't afford to go on to certain failure. It is half as easy to draw the lottery ticket, it is foolish to expect to draw the grand prize; now, isn't it?"

Wentworth, who knew more of the city and its ways than his partner did, at once recognized the truth of Longworth's argument, and said so.

"You are quite right, Mr. Longworth," he said; "and I think that all we need now discuss are the terms of our agreement with each other."

"That will be quite satisfactory on that score," replied Longworth. "I will take a third of the risk and a third of the profits, if that is satisfactory to you."

The agreement was completed on this basis, and Wentworth felt that a long step had been taken toward the end desired, but Kenyon wondered why their new partner had so suddenly changed his mind. Offices were taken near the bank, and much time and money were spent in fitting them up. Both Kenyon and Wentworth chafed at the delay, but their partner pointed out that nothing was to be gained by undue haste. Any attempt to rush things would be a bad effect in the city. Capital was timorous, and nothing must be done prematurely.

All in all, Kenyon and Wentworth received many excellent business maxims from their partner, and it is to be hoped they profited by them.

Prospectuses were printed, and a firm of solicitors was retained; but in spite of all this no real progress was made toward the formation of the Canadian Mica Mining Company (Limited).

William Longworth had an eye for beauty. One eye was generally covered with a round disk of glass, except when it fell out of its place and dangled in front of his waistcoat. Whether the monocle was inserted in sight or not, it is certain that William knew a pretty girl when he saw her. One of the housemaids in the Longworth household left suddenly, without just cause or provocation, as the advertisers say, and in her place was engaged a girl so pretty that when William Longworth caught sight of her, his monocle dropped from its place, and he stared at her with his two natural eyes, unassisted by optical science. He tried to speak to her on one or two occasions when he met her alone, but he could get no answer from the girl who was very shy and reticent when alone in her place, as they say. All this only enhanced her beauty in young Longworth's estimation, and he thought highly of his cousin's taste in the choosing of this young girl as dust the furniture.

William had a room in the house, which was partly sitting-room and partly office, and where he kept many of his papers. He was supposed to study matters of business deeply in his room, and it gave him a good excuse for arriving late at the office in the morning. He had been sitting up into the small hours, he would tell his uncle, although he would sometimes vary the excuse by saying that it was quieter in his room than in the city, and that he had spent the early part of the morning in reading documents.

The first time that William got an answer from the new housemaid was when he expressed his anxiety about the care of this room. He said that servants generally were very careless, and that he hoped she would attend to the room and see that his papers were kept nicely in order. This, without glancing up at him, the girl promised to do, and William thereafter found his room kept with a scrupulous neatness which would have delighted the most particular of men.

One morning when William was sitting in his room, enjoying an after-breakfast cigarette, the door opened softly and the new housemaid entered. Seeing him there, she seemed confused and was about to retire again when William, throwing his cigarette away, sprang to his feet.

"No, don't go," he said; "I was just about to ring."

The girl paused with her hand on the door.

"Yes," he continued, "I was just going to ring, but you have saved me the trouble; but, by the way, what is your name?"

"Susy, if you please, sir," replied the girl, modestly.

"Ah, well, Susy, just shut the door for a moment."

The girl did so, but evidently with some reluctance.

"Well, Susy," said William, jauntily, "I suppose that I am not the first one who has told you that you are very pretty."

"Oh, sir!" said Susy, blushing and looking down on the carpet.

"Yes, Susy, and you can take such good care of this room that I want to thank you for it," continued William.

Here he fumbled in his pocket for a moment and drew out half a sovereign.

"Here, my girl, is something for your trouble, and, I think, for yourself."

"Oh, I couldn't think of taking money, sir," said the girl, drawing back. "I couldn't, indeed, sir."

"Nonsense," said William; "isn't it enough?"

"Oh, it's more than enough. Miss Longworth pays me well for what I do, sir, and it's only my duty to keep things tidy."

"Yes, Susy, that is very true; but very few of us do our duty, you know, in this world."

"But we ought to, sir," said the girl, in a tone of quiet reproof that made the young man smile.

"Perhaps," said the young man; "but then, you see, we are not all pretty and good, like you. I'm sorry you won't take the money. I hope you are not offended at me for offering it," and William adjusted his monocle and looked his sweetest at the young person standing before him.

"Oh, no, sir," she said. "I'm not at all offended, and I thank you very much, very much, indeed, sir, and I would like to ask you a question, if you wouldn't think me too bold."

"Bold!" said William. "Why, I think you are the shyest little woman I have ever seen. I'll be very pleased to answer any question you may ask me. What is it?"

"You see, sir, I've got a little money of my own."

"Well, I declare, Susy, this is very interesting. I'd no idea you were an heiress."

"Oh! not an heiress, sir; far from it. It's only a little matter of four or five hundred pounds, sir," said Susy, dropping her eyes. "And little country which he thought most charming. "The money is in the bank and draws no interest, and I thought I would like to invest it where it would bring in something."

"Certainly, Susy, and a most laudable desire on your part. Was it about that you wished to question me?"

"Yes, if you please, sir. I saw this paper on your desk, and I thought I would ask you if you thought it would be safe for me to put my money in these mines, sir. Seeing the paper here, I supposed you had something to do with it."

William whisted a long, incredulous note, and said: "So you have been reading my papers, have you miss?"

"Oh! no, sir," said the girl, looking up at him with startled eyes. "I only saw the name Canadian Mica Mine on this, and the paper said it would pay ten per cent., and I thought if you had anything to do with it that my money would be quite safe."

"Oh! that goes without saying," said William; "but if I were you, my dear, I should not put my money in the mica mine."

"Oh! then, you haven't anything to do with the mine, sir?"

"Yes, Susy, I have. You see, fools build houses, and wise men live in them."

"So I have heard," said Susy, thoughtfully.

"Well, two young fools are building the house that we will call the Canadian Mica mine, and I am the wise man, don't you see, Susy?" said the young man, with a sweet smile.

"I am afraid I don't quite understand, sir."

"I don't suppose, Susy," replied the young man, with a laugh, "that there are many who do, but I think in a month's time I will own this mica mine, and then, my dear, if you still want to own a share or two, I shall be very pleased to give you a few without your spending any money at all."

"Oh! would you, sir?" cried Susy, in glad surprise, "and who owns the mine now?"

"Oh! two young fellows. You wouldn't know their names if I told them to you."

"And are they going to sell it to you, sir?"

William laughed heartily, and said: "Oh! no; they themselves will be sold."

"But how can that be, if they don't own the mine? You see I am only a very stupid girl, and don't understand business. That's why I asked you about my money."

"I don't suppose you know what an option is, do you, Susy?"

"No, sir, I don't. I never heard of it before."

"Well, these two young men have what is called an option on the mine, which is to say they are to pay a certain sum of money at a certain time and the mine is theirs, but if they don't pay the certain sum at the certain time, the mine isn't theirs."

"And won't they pay the money, sir?"

"No, Susy, they will not, because they haven't got it. Then these two fools will be sold, for they think they are going to get the money, and they are not."

"And you have the money to buy the mine when the option runs out, sir?"

"By Jove!" said William, in surprise, "you have a prodigious head for business, Susy. I never saw anyone pick it up so fast. You will have to take lessons from me and go on the market and speculate yourself."

"Oh, I should like to do that, sir, I should indeed."

"Well," said William, kindly, "whenever you have time, come to me and I will give you lessons." The young man came toward her, holding out his hand, but the girl slipped away from him and opened the door.

"I think," he said, in a whisper, "that you might give me a kiss after all this valuable information."

"Oh, Mr. William!" cried Susy, horrified.

He stepped forward and tried to catch her, but the girl was too nimble for him, and sprang out into the passage.

"I think," protested William, "that this is getting information under false pretenses; I expected my fee, you know."

"And you shall have it," said the girl, laughing softly, "when I get ten per cent. on my money."

"Egad," said William to himself, as he entered his room again, "I will see that you get it. She's as clever as an outside broker."

When young Longworth had left for his office, Susy swept and dusted out his room again, and then went down stairs.

"Where's the mistress?" she asked a fellow servant.

"In the library," was the answer, and to the library Susy went, entering the room without knocking, much to the amazement of Edith Longworth, who sat near the window with a book in her lap. But further surprise was in store for the lady of the house. The housemaid closed the door, and then, selecting a comfortable chair, threw herself down in it, exclaiming:

"Oh, dear me; I'm so tired."

"Susy," said Miss Longworth, "what is the meaning of this?"

"It means, mum," said Susy, "that I'm going to chuck it."

"Going to chuck it! asked Miss Longworth, amazed.

"Going to chuck it. Don't you understand? Going to give up my situation. I'm tired of it."

"Very well," said the young woman, rising, "you may give notice in the proper way. You have no right to come into this room in this impudent manner. Be so good as to go to your own room."

"My!" said Susy, "you can do the dignified. I must practice and see if I can accomplish an attitude like that. If you were a little prettier, Miss Longworth, I should call that striking," and the girl threw back her head and laughed.

Something in the laugh aroused Miss Longworth's recollection, and a chill of fear came over her, but, looking at the girl again, she saw she was mistaken. Susy jumped up, still laughing, and threw a little pin from the cap she wore, flinging it on the chair; then she pulled off her wig, and stood before Edith Longworth her natural self.

"Miss Brewster!" gasped the astonished Edith. "What are you doing in my house in that disguise?"

"Oh," said Jennie, "I'm the lady slavey, and how do you think I have acted the part? Now sit down. Miss Dignity, and I will tell you something about your own family. I thought you were a set of rogues, and now I can prove it."

"Will you leave my house this instant?" cried Edith, in anger. "I shall not listen to you."

"Oh, yes, you will," said Jennie, "for I shall follow your example and not let you out until you do hear what I have to tell you."

Saying which the amateur housemaid skipped nimbly to the door and placed her back against it.

CHAPTER XV.

Jennie Brewster stood with her back to the door, a sweet smile on her face.

"This is my day for acting, Miss Longworth. I think I did the role of housemaid so well that it deceived several members of the family. I am now giving an imitation of yourself in your thrilling drama: 'All at Sea.' Don't you think I do it most admirably?"

"Yes," said Edith, sitting down again. "I wonder you did not adopt the stage as a profession?"

"I have often thought of doing so, but journalism is more exciting."

"Perhaps. Still, it has its disappointments. When I gave my thrilling drama, as you call it, on shipboard, I had my stage accessories arranged to better advantage than you have now."

"Do you mean the putting off of the boat?"

"No; I mean that the electric button was under my hand—it was impossible for you to ring for help. Now, while you hold the door, you cannot stop me from ringing, for the bell rope is here beside me."

"Yes, that is a disadvantage, I admit. Do you intend to ring, then, and have me turned out?"

"I don't think that will be necessary. I imagine you will go quietly."

"You are a pretty clever girl, Miss Longworth. I wish I liked you, but I don't. So we won't waste valuable time deploring that fact. Have you no curiosity to hear what I was going to tell you?"

"Not the slightest; but there is one thing I should like to know."

"Oh, is there? Well, that's human, at any rate. What do you wish to know?"

"You came here well recommended. How did you know I wanted a housemaid, and were your testimonials—" Edith paused for a word, which Jennie promptly supplied.

"Forged? Oh, dear, no. There is no necessity for doing anything criminal in this country, if you have the money. I didn't forge them—I bought them. Didn't you write to any of the good ladies who stood sponsor for me?"

"Yes, and received most flattering accounts of you."

"Certainly. That was part of the contract. Oh, you can do anything with money in London; it is a most delightful town. Then, as for knowing there is a vacancy, that was money. I bribed the other housemaid to leave."

"I see. And what object had you in all this?"

Jennie Brewster laughed—the same strong laugh that had charmed William an hour or two before—a laugh that sometimes haunted Wentworth's memory in the city. She left her sentinel-like position at the door and threw herself into a chair.

"Miss Longworth," she said, "you are not consistent. You first pretend that you have no curiosity to hear what I have to say, then you ask me exactly what I was going to tell you. Of course you are dying to know why I am here; so you shouldn't pretend that you weren't. Now, I've changed my mind and I don't intend to tell you. I will say though that my object in coming here was, first, to find out for myself how servants are treated in this country. You see my sympathies are all with the women who work, and not with the women—well, like yourself, for instance."

"Yes, I think you said that once before. And how do we treat our servants?"

"So far as my experience goes, very well indeed."

"It is most gratifying to hear you say this. I was afraid we might not have such favorable opinion. And now, where shall I send you your month's money, Miss Brewster?"

Jennie Brewster leaned back in her chair, her eyes all but closed, an angry light shooting from them that reminded Edith of her glance of hatred on board the steamship. A rich warm glow of color overspread her fair face, and her lips closed tightly. There was a moment's silence between them, and then Jennie Brewster composed herself as quickly as it came. She laughed, with just a touch of restraint in her tone.

"You can say an insulting thing more calmly and sweetly than anyone I ever met before in my life. When I was a boy anything low down and mean, I say it in anger, and my voice has a certain amount of acridity in it. I can't purr like a cat and scratch at the same time—I wish I could."

"Is it an insult to offer you the money you have earned?"

"Yes, it is, and you knew it was when you spoke. You don't understand me a little bit."

"Is it necessary that I should?"

"I don't suppose you think it is," said Jennie, meditatively, resting her elbow on her knee and her chin on her palm. "The reason for our point of view differs. I think everything. I am interesta me to know what people think and talk about, and somehow it doesn't seem to matter to me what the people are, for I was even more interested in your butler's political opinion than I was in Frederick Bingham's. They are both conservatives, but Lord Freddie seems shaky in his views, for you can argue him down in five minutes, but the butler is as steadfast as a rock. I don't suppose that Lord Freddie you will break the news of my departure gently to him, for he proposed to me, and he has not yet had his answer."

"There is still time," said Edith, smiling in spite of herself. "Shall I ring for him?"

"Please do not. I want to avoid a painful scene, because he is so sure of himself and never dreams of a refusal. It is such a pity, too, for the butler is my ideal of a conservative. All the aristocracy should be. His dignity is something awe inspiring, while Lord Freddie is such a simple, good-natured, every-day young fellow, that if I imported him to the states I am sure no one would believe he was a real lord. With the butler it would be so different," added Jennie, with a deep sigh.

"It is too bad that you cannot exchange the declaration of the butler for one from Lord Freddie."

"Too bad!" cried Jennie, looking with wide-open eyes at the girl before her. "Why, bless you, I had a proposal from Lord Freddie two weeks before I ever saw the butler. I see you don't believe a word I say. Well, you ask Lord Freddie. I'll introduce you and you tell him you don't believe he asked me to be Lady Freddie, if that's the title. He'll look sheepish, but he won't deny it. You see, when I found I was going to stay in England for a time I wrote to the editor of the Argus to get me a bunch of letters of introduction and send them over, as I wanted particularly to study the aristocracy. So he sent them, and, I assure you, I found it much more difficult to get into your servants' hall than I did into the halls of the nobility; besides, it cost less to mix with the Upper Ten."

Edith sat in silence, looking with amazed interest at the young woman, who talked so rapidly that there was sometimes a difficulty in following what she said.

"No, Lord Freddie was not half so condescending as the butler, neither was his language so well chosen; but then, I suppose, the butler's had more practice, for Freddie is very young. I am exceedingly disappointed with the aristocracy. They are not nearly so haughty as I had imagined them to be, and what astonished me in this country is the way you women spoil the men. You are much too good to them. You pet them and fawn on them, and naturally they get conceited. It is such a pity, too, for they are nice fellows when alone. It is the same everywhere I've been—servants' hall and all. Why, when you meet a young couple, of what you are pleased to call the lower classes, walking in the park, the man hangs down his head as he talks to the girl, the girl looks defiantly at you, as much as to say: 'I've got him. Bless him!' What do you have to say about it?' while the man seems to be ashamed of himself, and evidently feels that he has been had. Now, a man should be made to understand that you're doing him a great favor when you give him a civil word. That's the proper state of mind to keep a man in, and then you can do what you like with him. I generally make him propose, so as to get it over before any real harm's done, and to give an artistic finish to the episode. After that you can be real good friends, and have a jolly time. That's what I did with Lord Freddie. We all went up the river one day—two young men friends of Freddie's and two nice girls, a chaperon, and myself. Would you believe that those two girls proposed to tow us up stream, and the young men actually allowed them. I was steering, and it made me so angry I couldn't speak. Lord Freddie seemed to feel that it was necessary to keep up a conversation, but when I didn't reply to him he calmly lit his pipe and began to row with the girls. They declined with their hats over their eyes and, I think, went to sleep. Meanwhile the two nice girls trudged along the bank together, pulling the rope. I would have sunk the boat if I could, but I didn't know how. When we got to the place where we were to have tea, the young men said it was jolly nice of the girls to tow them so far; then they went and sprawled under some trees, leaving the complacent girls to get tea ready. I couldn't stand it any longer. I went up to the three sprawlers under the tree, and, bidding them good-by, I started down the towpath. Lord Freddie sprang up and, running after me, asked where I was going. I told him I was going to walk back to London. He laughed and said I couldn't; it was 50 miles away. But when he saw I was in earnest, he became anxious to know what the matter was.

"I told him I thought I had come out with three gentlemen, but, finding I was mistaken, I was just going back. He got very red, and then I just gave him my opinion of him and his friends. Coming down with three girls and paying no more attention to them than if they were three dolls. That settled things. Freddie apologized, and he said he would go back and shake the girls up a bit, which, I suppose, he did, for the bruised were as nice as could be to us after that. When Freddie and I were towing the boat back he proposed, and I laughed at him. After awhile he began to laugh, too, and so we had a pleasant time. What a lovely little river the Thames is, isn't it? A nice, clean, little pocket river. I would like to buy it and put it in our back yard in America, just to sit on the bank by it. Now, here am I, chattering away as if I were paid for talking instead of writing. Why do you look at me so? Don't you believe what I tell you?"

"Yes, I believe all you say. What I can't understand is why a bright girl like you should enter a house and—well —do what you have done here, for instance."

"Why shouldn't I? I am after accurate information. I get it in my own way. Some writers sell how the poor live, and that sort of thing. They enter the houses of the poor quite unblushingly, and print their impressions of the poverty-stricken homes. Now, why shouldn't the rich man be exempt from a similar investigation?"

"In either case it is the work of a spy."

"Yes, but a spy is not a disbonorable person; at least he need not be. I saw a monument in Westminster Abbey to a man who was hanged as a spy. A spy must be brave; he must have nerve, caution and resource. He sometimes does more for his country than a whole regiment. Spies are worse than persons than spies in the world."

"I suppose there are, still—"

"Yes, I know. It is easy for persons with plenty of money to moralize on the shortcomings of others. I'll tell you a secret. The writing of books, and if it's a success, then good-by to journalism. I don't like the spy business myself any too well; I'm afraid England is contaminating me, and if I stayed here a few years I might degenerate so far as to think your news papers interesting. By the way, do you know Mr. Wentworth's address?"

Edith hesitated a moment, and at last answered: "Yes, I do."

"Will you give it to me? I think I ought to write him a note of apology for all the anxiety I caused him on board ship. You may not believe it, but I have actually had some twinges of conscience over that episode. I suppose that's why I partially forgive you for stopping the cablegram."

CHAPTER XVI.

Edith Longworth was astonished at herself for giving the address to the young woman, but she could not. Lady Slavey departed in a flood of gas by way of farewell: "I'm going to write up your household, you know."

When the new offices of the Canadian Mica Mining Company, Limited, were completed, Kenyon took charge of them. He was somewhat disappointed by their grandeur, and he thought the unnecessary expense had been lavished in the fittings, but as they were paid for by the said nothing, although a shiver of fear ran over him when he thought of the possible failure of the scheme, leaving the rapidly depreciating debt hanging over him. Kenyon placed a desk in one of the back offices, while a clerk in the front office was away prospectuses to all who applied and furnished useful knowledge to inquiring public. Most of the callers were newspaper canvassers who wanted advertisements, which John Kenyon was unable to supply, as that department was under the management of Wentworth, who had reported to Kenyon readily supplied, feeling glad that no advertisement was asked for.

Longworth was seldom at the new offices. He was busy seeing acquaintances who would take stock in the new mining company, and he cautioned his partners against being in too much of a hurry, and he assured Wentworth by informing him that he had overcome the objections and secured the cooperation of people who had reported so favorably about the mineral, thus showing that the thing could be accomplished if you took your time over it. A Mr. King, also connected with the china works, had promised his assistance.

The first meeting of proposed shareholders was set for Monday afternoon, and Longworth expressed his belief that the forming of the company would be accomplished before the week was out.

One day when Kenyon entered the office the clerk said to him:

"That young gentleman has been here twice to see you. He said it was very important, sir."

"Which young gentleman?"

"That gentleman—here is his card—who belongs to the Financial Field, sir."

"Did he leave any message?"

"Yes, sir; said he would call again at three o'clock"

"Very good," said Kenyon, and he began compiling the address to prospective subscribers.

At three o'clock the smooth-shaven gentleman from the Financial Field put in an appearance.

"Ah, Mr. Kenyon," he said, "I am glad to meet you. I have called twice, but had not the good fortune to find you in. Can I see you in private for a moment?"

"Certainly," said the astonished Kenyon closing the door behind them.

"Now," said the representative of the Financial Field, "I have brought a proof of the editorial which we propose using, and which I am desired by the proprietor to show you, so it may be free, if possible, from any error. We are very anxious to have things right with the new company, and with this he handed to John a long slip of white paper with a column of printed matter upon it.

The article was headed, "The Canadian Mica Mining Company, Limited." As Kenyon began to read he saw that it was a boom, and that, if published, it would have the effect of making the shares go up with a bound. Visions of wealth flashed before his eyes, and he thought of the chances there were for investors getting a good return for their money by buying shares. John read it through carefully.

"It's a very handsome article," he said, "and it is without an error, so far as I can see."

"I am glad you think so, replied the young gentleman, folding up the proof and putting it in his breast pocket. "You will recollect, although I am not the advertising canvasser of the Financial Field, I thought I would see you with reference to an advertisement for the paper."

"Well, you see we have not had a meeting of the proposed stockholders yet, and we are not in a position to give any advertisements about the mine. We have no doubt advertisements will be given, and, of course, your paper will be remembered when that time comes."

"Ah!" said the young man, "that is hardly satisfactory to us. We have a vacant half page for Monday—the best position in the paper—and the proprietor thought you would like to secure it."

"As I said a moment ago, we are not in a position to secure it. It is premature to talk of advertising at the present state of affairs."

"I think your paper will be to your interest to take the half page. The price is £300, and besides that amount we should like to have some shares in the company."

"Do you mean for one insertion of the advertisement?"

"Yes, that is what I mean."

"Don't that strike you as being a trifle exorbitant? Your paper has a comparatively limited circulation. I think they do not ask us anything like that price even in the large dailies."

"Ah! my dear sir, the large dailies are quite different. They have a tremendous circulation, it is true, but it is the kind of circulation we have. No other paper circulates so largely among investors as the Financial Field. It is read by exactly the kind of people you desire to reach, and I may say that, except through the Field, you cannot get at some of the best men in the city."

"Well, admitting all that, as I have said once or twice, we are not yet in a position to give an advertisement."

"Then I am very sorry to say that we

"Well, Susy," said William, "I suppose I am not the first one who has told you that you were pretty."

...ast on Monday publish the article ...have shown you."

"Very well, I cannot help it. You ...not compelled to print it unless you ...k I am not sure, either, that pub...ng the article would do us any ...d. It would be premature, as I ...d say.

"We are not yet ready to court publicity until we have had our first ...eeting of proposed stockholders."

"When is your first meeting of stock...holders?"

"On Monday at three o'clock."

"Very well, we could put that announcement in another column, and I am sure you would find the attendance at your meeting would be very largely and substantially increased."

"Possibly, but I decline to do anything like advertising."

"If think you would find it would pay you extremely well to take that half page."

"I am not questioning that fact at all. I am merely saying what I have said to everyone else, that we are not ready to court advertising."

"I am sorry we cannot come to an arrangement, Mr. Kenyon, very sorry indeed," and saying this, he took another proof sheet out of his pocket, which he handed to Kenyon. "If we cannot come to an understanding, the manager has determined to print this, instead of the article I showed you. Would you kindly glance it over, because we would like to have it as correct as possible."

Kenyon opened the sheet and unfolded the paper. The heading was the same, but he had read only a sentence or two when he found that the mica mine was one of the greatest swindles ever attempted on poor old innocent financial Scotland.

"Do you mean to say," cried John, looking up at him with his anger kindling, "that if I do not bribe you to the extent of £300, besides giving you an unknown quantity of stock, you will publish that libel?"

"If do not say it is a libel," said the young man smoothly; "that would be a matter for the courts to decide. You might sue us for libel if you thought we had reason for doing so. I may say that has been tried several times, but with indifferent success."

"Do you mean £800 for one insertion?"

"Do you mean to tell me that you mean to publish this article if I do not pay you £300?"

"No; putting it crudely, that is exactly what I do mean."

Kenyon rose in his wrath and flung open the door.

"I must ask you to leave this place, and leave it at once. If you ever put in an appearance here again while I am in the office, I will call a policeman and have you arrested."

"Gradually," expostulated the other, "surely, it is merely a matter of business. If you find it impossible to deal with us there is no harm done. If our paper has no influence, we cannot possibly injure you. That, of course, is entirely for you to judge. If my time between now and Sunday night you conclude to act otherwise, a wire to our office will hold things over until we have had an opportunity of coming to an arrangement with you. If not, this article will be published on Monday morning. I wish you a very good afternoon, sir."

John said nothing, but watched his visitor out on the pavement, and then returned to the making of his report.

On Monday morning as he came in by tube, his eye caught a flaming poster on one of the bill boards at the station. It was headed Financial Field, and the next line, in heavy black letters, was "The Mica Mining Swindle." Kenyon called a boy to him and bought a copy of the paper. There, in leaded type, was the article before him. It read, somehow, much more important on the printed page than it had looked on the proof.

As he read it he noticed an air of truthful sincerity about the article that had escaped him during the brief glance he had given it on Friday. It seemed to say that the Austrian Mining company had sunk a good deal of money in the mine, and that it had never paid a penny of dividends—that they merely kept on the mine at a constant loss to themselves in the hope of being able to swindle some confiding investors—that even their designs were as nothing compared to the barefaced attempt at swindling contemplated by John Kenyon. He caught his breath as he saw his own name in print. It was a shock for which he was not prepared, and he had not noticed it in the proof. Then he read on, but learned that this man, Kenyon, had seduced the mine at something like £10,000, and was trying to shove it off on the unfortunate British public at the enormous increase of £200,000; but this nefarious attempt would doubtless be frustrated as long as there were papers of the integrity of the Financial Field that took the risk and expense of making such an exposure as was here set forth.

The article possessed a singular fascination for Kenyon. He read and reread it in a dazed way as if the statement referred to some other person, and he could not help feeling sorry for her person.

He still had the paper in his hand as he walked up the street, and he felt somehow dazed as if some one had ...

over in crossing one of the thoroughfares, and heard an outburst of profanity directed at him from a cab driver and a man on a bus; but he heeded them not, walking through the crowd like one under a spell.

He passed the door of his own gorgeous office and walked a considerable distance up and down the street before he realized what he had done. Then he turned back again, and, just at the doorstep, paused with a pang at his heart:

"I wonder if Edith Longworth will read that article," he said to himself.

CHAPTER XVII.

When John Kenyon entered his office it seemed to him that his clerk looked at him askance. He imagined that innocent gentleman had been reading the article in the Financial Field, but the truth is John was hardly in a frame of mind to form a correct opinion on what other people had been doing. Everybody he met in the street, it seemed to him, was discussing the article in the Financial Field.

He asked if anybody had been in that morning, and was told that there had been no callers. Then he passed into the directors' room, closed the door behind him, sat down on a chair and leaned his elbows on his hands with his elbows on the table. In this position Wentworth found him some time later, and when John looked up his face was haggard and aged.

"Ah! I see you have read it."

"Yes."

"Do you think Longworth is at the bottom of that article?"

John shook his head. "Oh, no!" he said; "he had nothing whatever to do with it."

"How do you know?"

Kenyon related exactly what had passed between the oily young man of the Financial Field and himself in that very room. While this recital was going on Wentworth walked up and down, evidently in deep opinion now and then in remarks that were short and pithy, but hardly fit for publication. When the story was done he turned on Kenyon.

"Well," he said, there is nothing for it but sue the paper for libel."

"What good will that do?"

"What good will it do! Do you mean to say that you intend to sit here under such an imputation as they have cast upon you and do nothing? What good will it do? It will do all the good in the world."

"We cannot form our company and sue the paper at the same time. All our energies will have to be directed toward the latter as we have in fact."

"But, my dear John, don't you see the effect of that article? How can we form our company if such a lie remains unchallenged? Nobody will look at our proposals. Every one will say: 'Why have you not taken action about the article that appeared in the Financial Field?' If we say we have done nothing, then, of course, the natural inference is that we are a pair of swindlers, and that our scheme is a fraud."

"I have always thought," said John, "that the capitalization is too high."

"Really, I believe you think that article is not so unfair after all, John, I am astonished at you."

"But if we commence a libel suit it cannot be finished before our option has expired. If we tell the people that we have begun to sue the Financial Field for libel they will say they prefer to wait and hear what the result of the case is. By that time our chances of forming a company will be gone."

Before John could reply there was a knock at the door, and the clerk entered with a letter in his hand which had just come in. Kenyon tore it open, read it, and then tossed it across the table to Wentworth. Wentworth saw the name of their firm of solicitors at the top of the letter paper. Then he read:

Dear sir,—We are in doubt as to the article in the Financial Field of this morning referring to the Canadian Mica Mining company, and shall be pleased to know what action you intend to take in the matter. We may say that, in justice to our reputation, we are pleased to know the company unless a suit is brought against the paper which contains the article. Yours truly, W. H. and Co.

Wentworth laughed with a certain bitterness. "Well," he said, "if it has come to such a pass that Hawk fears for his reputation, the sooner we bring a libel suit against the paper the better."

"Perhaps," said John, with a look of agony on his face, "you will tell me where the money is to come from. The moment we get into the law courts money will simply have to flow like water, and doubtless the Field has plenty of it. It will add to their reputation, and they will make a boast that they are fighting the battle of the investor in Europe, everything is grist to that comes to their mill. Meanwhile we shall be paying out money, or we shall be at a tremendous disadvantage, and the result of it all will probably be a disagreement of the jury and practically no rule us. You see, I have no witnesses."

"Yes, but what about the mine? How can we go on without vindicating ourselves?"

Before anything further could be said young Mr. Longworth came in, looking as cool, calm, and unruffled as if there were no such things in the world as financial newspapers.

"Discussing it, I see," were his first words.

"Yes," said Wentworth. "I am very glad you have come. We have a little difference of opinion in the matter of that article. Kenyon here is averse to suing that paper for libel. I am in favor of prosecuting it. Now what do you say?"

"My dear fellow," replied Longworth, "I am delighted to be able to agree with Mr. Kenyon for once. See them! Why, certainly not. That is just what they want."

"But," said Wentworth, "if we do not, who is going to look at our mine?"

"Exactly the same number of people as would look at it before the article appeared."

HOW IT IS VIEWED

Opinions in Washington of Cleveland's Final Message.

CUBAN QUESTION LEADS DISCUSSION

Many Senators and Representatives Look To Express Their Views—Members of Foreign Relations Committee Particularly Reticent.

Washington, Dec. 8.—Views of a number of senators and representatives on the president's message were sought this morning by a representative of the United Associated Presses, and although they were generally changing their comments several were found who willingly expressed their opinions of the message. Speaker Reed said: "It seems hardly necessary to comment upon the message. It is calm in tone and on the Cuban question will be much more satisfactory to the community than it would have been a year ago, as much sounder ideas prevail than prevailed then. I wish there had been as frank an acknowledgement of the deficit a year ago as there is now. The idea that the revenue is sufficient, without further borrowing, seems to me hardly tenable." Gen. Grosvenor, rep., Ohio: "The treatment of the Cuban and other foreign matters will not be satisfactory to those who have so earnestly hoped for the end of the war in Cuba, in the interests of and early cessation of wholesale murder in the unhappy island of Cuba. The reference to the tariff is far from satisfactory. The claim that price of commodities has been reduced to the benefit of the people is unimportant when we realize that idleness by force has placed even cheap goods beyond the reach of so vast a body of our people." Francis G. Newlands, silverite, Nevada, said that the message on financial ills proposed by the president, namely, the retirement of the greenbacks and the substitution of national bank notes, would not give the needed relief. Mr. McCreary, dem., Ky., said: "I am pleased with the president's reference to the Cuban and the Venezuelan questions and the tariff." Mr. Taft, rep., O.: "The president has stated the position of the United States forcibly. What he says on the question, as a notice to Spain that the present conditions cannot continue indefinitely." Mr. Lound, rep., Cal.: "The position of the president on Cuban affairs should receive the commendation of all Americans. No other grip unified, yet it is sufficiently aggressive to intimate to Spain that this country is anxiously watching events in Cuba." Mr. Bartlett, dem., N. Y., expressed the opinion that the time for intervention by the United States should interfere in the struggle between Cuba and Spain. Mr. Barrett, rep., Mass.: "The message shows that the administration will do nothing regarding Cuba. An attempt will be made to force the insurgents to submit to some radical measures. I do not believe that it will succeed. That and the Hawaiian question will go over to the next administration. The democrats have no cue in the message, except to do nothing." Representative Morse of Massachusetts—"What the president says of the Turkish situation does credit to his humanity. What he says about the struggle in Cuba and his intimations to Spain are patriotic, humane, and perhaps as far as the country is justified in going in the present situation of affairs." Mr. Walker, rep., Mass.—"What the president says about the weakness of our banking system and its reform is most admirable. When he suggests, however, that the greenbacks be retired by the issue of bonds he forgets that we passed an act in 1878 providing that when only $30,000,000 had been retired the people rose up and congress repealed the act. In 1875 an act was passed to retire them, with the same result as in 1866." Mr. Daniell, rep., Va.—"The message is fair as to everything but the tariff. The only two questions that the public are interested in are Cuba and the tariff. I like best that reference to Cuba where he shows a determination not to permit any power to interfere in the island's affairs. The president is unfair on the tariff." Senators who were loth to discuss the message were especially noticeable among members of the committee on foreign relations. Of this committee, Senators Sherman, Davis, Cameron, Lodge, Gray, Turpie, Daniel and Mills refused to discuss the message in the most formal way. Other senators of prominence who declined to talk were Aldrich, Hale, Pritchard, Wolcott, Gorman and Jones. Frye of Maine said: "The message is common place. So far as the Cuban question concerned the president argues on both sides of the subject." Senator Chandler of New Hampshire: "The president is strong on Cuba and its treatment is adequate to a certain point, but it does not go as far as I would wish. On the tariff it is weak."

THE MESSAGE.

Cuban Situation and Tariff and Finance the Principal Discussions.

Washington, Dec. 8.—The president's message is received as a fitting public farewell from the man whose policies and personality have occupied so much public attention for twelve years. The document is neither very long nor very abbreviated. The chief topics of interest are the Cuban and financial questions. Announcement is made of the prospective settlement of the Venezuelan boundary question, and that negotiations for a treaty of general arbitration of all differences between Great Britain and the United States are far advanced and promise to result in successful consummation at an early date. The president deplores the situation in the east, and expresses the disbelief that "the present sombre prospect in Turkey will be long permitted to offend the sight of Christendom." Regarding Cuba, the president says:

For Peace in Cuba.

"These inevitable entanglements of the United States with the rebellion in in Cuba, the large American property interests affected, and considerations humane, European and humanity in general, have led to a vehement demand in various quarters for some sort of positive intervention on the part of the United States. It was at first proposed that belligerent rights should be accorded to the insurgents—a proposition no longer urged, because ultimately and in practical operation clearly perilous and injurious to our own interests. It has since been and is now sometimes contended that the independence of the insurgents should be recognized. But imperfect and restricted as the Spanish government of the island may be, no other exists there—unless the will of the military officer in temporary command of a particular district may be ranked as a species of government. It is now also suggested that the United States should buy the island—a suggestion possibly worthy of consideration if there were any evidence of a desire or willingness on the part of Spain to entertain such a proposal. It is urged, finally, that, all other methods failing, the existing internecine strife in Cuba should be terminated by our intervention. Even at the near bet ween the United States and Spain—a war which its advocates confidently prophesy could be neither large in its proportions nor doubtful in its issue.

Right and Not Might Our Rule.

"The correctness of this forecast need be only hinted at here. Nevertheless a characteristic to maintain as a nation, which plainly dictates that right and not might should be the rule of its conduct. Further, though the United State is not a nation for financial ills proposed by the president, namely, the retirement of the greenbacks and the substitution of national bank notes, would not give the needed relief. Mr. McCreary, dem., Ky., said: "I am pleased with the president's reference to the Cuban and the Venezuelan questions and the tariff." THE MESSAGE.

Cuban Situation and Tariff and Finance the Principal Discussions.

Washington, Dec. 8.—The president's message is received as a fitting public farewell from the man whose policies and personality have occupied so much public attention for twelve years. The document is neither very long nor very abbreviated. The chief topics of interest are the Cuban and financial questions. Announcement is made of the prospective settlement of the Venezuelan boundary question, and that negotiations for a treaty of general arbitration of all differences between Great Britain and the United States are far advanced and promise to result in successful consummation at an early date. The president deplores the situation in the east, and expresses Offer Made to Spain.

"Nevertheless, realizing that suspicions and precautions on the part of ...

...ways natural and not always unjustifiable—being sincerely desirous in the interest of both as well as on its own account that the Cuban problem should be solved with the least possible delay —it was intimated by this government to the government of Spain several months ago that, if a satisfactory measure of home rule were tendered the Cuban insurgents, and would be accepted by them upon a guaranty of its execution, the United States would endeavor to find a way not objectionable to Spain of furnishing such a guaranty. While no definite response to this intimation has yet been received from the Spanish government, it is believed to be not altogether inconclusive, while, as already suggested, no reason is perceived why it should not be approved by the insurgents. It is therefore fervently hoped on all grounds that earnest efforts for healing the breech between Spain and her revolted Cubans, upon the lines above indicated, may be at once inaugurated and pushed to an immediate and successful issue. The friendly offices of the United States, if tendered, will be gladly utilized or in any other way consistent with our constitution and laws, will always be at the disposal of either party.

When Our Patience May End.

"Whatever circumstances may arise, our policy will be the same. We would constrain us to object to the acquisition of the island or an interference with its control by any other power. It should be added that it cannot be reasonably assumed that our forbearance will be indefinitely maintained. While we are anxious to accord all due respect to the sovereignty of Spain, we cannot view the pending conflict in all its features, and the widespread disorder inevitably close relations to it, and its possible results, without considering that by the course of events we may be drawn into such an unusual and unprecedented condition, as will fix a limit to our patience and our forbearance in the contest, either alone and in her own way, or with our friendly co-operation. When the inability of Spain to deal successfully with the insurrection has become manifest, and it is demonstrated that her sovereignty is extinct in Cuba for all purposes of its rightful existence, and when a hopeless struggle for its re-establishment has degenerated into a strife which means nothing more than the useless sacrifice of human life and the utter destruction of the very subject-matter of the conflict, a situation will be presented in which our obligations to the sovereignty of Spain will be superseded by higher obligations, which we can hardly hesitate to recognize and discharge.

Our Present Policy.

"Deferring the choice of ways and methods until the time for action arrives, we should make them depend upon the precise conditions then existing; and they should not be determined upon without due care and full and every consideration involving our honor and interest, or the international duty we owe to Spain. Until we face the contingencies suggested, or the situation is by other incidents presented, requiring action, we should continue in the line of conduct heretofore pursued, thus in all circumstances exhibiting our obedience to the requirements of public law and our regard for the duty enjoined upon us by the position we occupy in the family of nations. A contemplation of emergencies that may arise should plainly lead us to avoid their creation, either through a careless disregard of present duty or even through any unfriendly and illtimed expression of feeling. But I have deemed it not amiss to remind the congress that a time may arrive when a correct policy and care for our interests, as well as in regard for the interests of other nations and their citizens, joined by considerations of humanity and a desire to see a rich and fertile country, intimately related to us, saved from complete devastation, will demand that definite action be taken by us which will subserve the interests thus involved and at the same time promise to Cuba and its inhabitants an opportunity to enjoy the blessings of peace."

Tariff and Finance.

The president submits a statement of the revenues and expenses of the government, and adds: "I believe our present tariff law, if allowed a fair opportunity, will in the near future yield a revenue which, with reasonable economical expenditures, will overcome all deficiencies. In the meantime no deficit that has occurred or may occur need excite or disturb us. For any such deficit we have in the treasury, in addition to a gold reserve of one hundred millions, a surplus of more than one hundred and twenty-eight millions of dollars applicable to the payment of the expenditures of the government, and which must, unless expended for that purpose, remain a useless hoard, or, if not extravagantly wasted, must in any event be perverted from the purpose of its exaction from our people. To the extent, therefore, of the deficiency in the revenue from this fund is nothing more than its proper or legitimate use. The government thus applying a surplus fortunately in its treasury to the payment of expenses justly chargeable to its revenues, is not at all to be likened to a man living beyond his income and thus incurring debt or encroaching on his principal. It is not one of the functions of our government to accumulate and make additions to a fund not needed for immediate expenditure. With individuals it is the chief object of struggle and effort. The application of accumulated fund by the government to the payment of its running expenses is a duty. It is immeasurably better to appropriate our surplus to the payment of justifiable expenses than to allow it to become an invitation to reckless appropriations or to extravagant expenditures.

"This reference to the condition and prospects of our revenues naturally and very properly leads to the consideration of our financial methods. They have been frequently pressed upon the attention of congress in previous executive communications and the inevitable danger of their continued toleration pointed out. Without again repeating these details, I can not refrain from again solemnly pressing the necessity of the prompt reform of a system opposed to every rule of sound finance and shown by experience to be fraught with the gravest peril and perplexity. I am more convinced than ever that we can have no assured financial peace and safety until the government currency obligations upon which gold may be demanded from the treasury are withdrawn from circulation and canceled. This might be done, as has been heretofore recommended, by their exchange for long-term bonds bearing a low rate of interest or by their redemption with the proceeds of such bonds. Even if only the United States notes known as greenbacks were thus retired, it is probable that the treasury notes issued in payment of silver purchases under the act of July 14, 1890, now paid in gold when demanded, would not create much disturbance, as they might, from time to time, when received in the treasury by redemption in gold or otherwise, be gradually and prudently retired from circulation. The plan of issuing bonds for the purpose of redemption certainly appears to be the most effective and direct path to the needed reform. In default of this, however, it would be a step in the right direction if currency obligations redeemable in gold, whenever so redeemed, should be canceled instead of being reissued. This operation would be a slow remedy, but it would improve the present conditions. National banks should redeem their own notes. They should be allowed to issue circulation to the par value of bonds deposited as security for its redemption, and the tax on their circulation should be reduced to one-fourth of 1 per cent. In considering projects for the retirement of United States notes and treasury notes issued under the law of 1890, I am of the opinion that we have placed as much stress upon the danger of contracting the currency, and have calculated too little upon the gold that would be added to our circulation if invited to us by better and safer financial methods. It is not so much a contraction of our currency that should be avoided as its unequal distribution. This might be obviated, and any fear of harmful contraction at the same time removed, by allowing the organizations of smaller banks and in less populous communities than are now permitted, and also authorizing existing banks to establish branches in small communities under proper restrictions. The entire case may be presented by the statement that legislation which will wisely and sound financial methods will not dawn upon us until our government abandons the banking business and the accumulation of funds, and confines its operations to the receipt and payment of the money contributed by the people for its support, and to the expenditure of such money for the people's benefit."

Trusts and the Laws.

"Another topic," says the president, "in which our people rightfully take a deep interest may be here briefly considered. I refer to the existence of trusts and other huge aggregations of capital, the object of which is to secure the monopoly of some particular branch of trade, industry or commerce and to stifle competition and restriction. When these are defended it is usually on the ground that though they increase profits they also reduce prices and thus may benefit the public. Their tendency is to crush out individual independence and to hinder or prevent the free use of human faculties and the full development of human character. Though congress has attempted to deal with this matter by legislation, the laws passed for that purpose thus far have proved ineffective, not because of any lack of disposition or attempt to enforce them, but simply because the laws themselves as interpreted do not reach the difficulty. If the insufficiencies of existing laws can be remedied by further legislation it should be done. Even though it may be found that federal authority is not broad enough to fully reach the evil, there can be no doubt of the power of the several states to act effectively in the premises, and there should be no reason to doubt their willingness to judiciously exercise such powers."

McKinley Reads the Message.

Canton, O., Dec. 8.—Major McKinley read President Cleveland's message through with great interest, but without comment. The portion of it devoted to the Cuban question was discussed by those present. The consensus of opinion was that it was an informing presentation of the situation and, on the whole, about what was expected. Col. M. T. Herrick of Cleveland said it was conservative and breathed a spirit of fairness which would be commended.

Reasoning.

"You are charged with knocking the complainant down with a club and taking all his valuables," said the judge.

"He tole me to," said the prisoner.

"Eh?"

"He tole me to do it. I stops him on the corner to get a light, see? An', of course, we got to talkin' about de money question. Den he says to me: 'De ony right way to git at de money question is to start right in on first principles,' he says. 'Is dat de way youse want to do?' I says. 'It is,' says he. 'All right,' I says, an' socks it to him, an' he says he belongs to me by rights of first principles."—Indianapolis Journal.

THEATRICAL.

In "Brian Boru," as presented by the Whitney Opera Company, the Broadway Theatre in New York has the greatest artistic and financial success it has enjoyed for several seasons. The 50th performance was celebrated on Monday evening, Nov. 30th, when beautiful silver card receivers were distributed. A fortnight ago the 69th Regiment attended in a body; lately the members of the New York Athletic Club saw the opera, and on the evening of Dec. 1st the Catholic Society, of New York, attended in a body. There has been a succession of crowded houses; the horse show or the opera has not diminished the patronage in the least. In fact, last week's business was larger than any previous week. Early in the spring, after filling engagements in Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago, "Brian Boru" will be seen in London by the Whitney Company. The entire cast, scenery and properties will be sent over seas. This will be the first American opera company to visit the British capital.

Big crowds at the Pleasure Palace yesterday applauded mightily when "Teddy" Hale appeared, The winner of the six day race seemed none the worse for his effort, beyond a slight stiffness, which wore off before he had completed his exhibitions of bicycling riding. The star feature of the vaudeville was Richard Harlow, in "Catching an Heiress." Walter Stuart assisted him. The Rossow Brothers gave their athletic and wrestling exhibitions. The Vilona Sisters produced music with violins and piano, and the three Delphinos, French musical clowns, were amusing. Others on the bill were Mrs Eddie Girard, Marie Heath, Blocksom and Page, Dailey and Hilton, Van and Vera, Lavarnie and Leseur, Dawson and Farlow, dancers; Marion and Pearl Violetta, transformation dancers, and Mabel Guyer, soubrette.

Increased Attendance.

The increase in the number of pupils at the North Plainfield Public School during the last year has been remarkable. A glance at the records of the school shows clearly what the gain has been. In November, 1905, the enrollment was 718, and in November, 1906, the enrollment was 815, making a gain in enrolment of 97. The average attendance during November, 1905, was 612; in November 1906, it was 731, an increase of 119 in the average attendance.

Soothing, and not irritating, strengthening, and not weakening, small but effective—such are the qualities of DeWitt's Little Early Risers, the famous little pills. L. W. Randolph, 143 West Front street.

A Quadruple Birthday.

At the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Bovey, yesterday, there was held a quadruple birthday party, it being to celebrate the birthday of Mr. Bovey, of his daughter, Mrs. William Demarest, and the latter's two little girls, Alice and Louise, their birthdays all occurring during the week. The occasion was one of joyfulness and festivity. Many presents and good wishes were exchanged. The supper was not the last of the evening's entertainment. Nicholas B. O'Connor, of New York, was one of the guests.

Thrown From a Wagon.

While Mrs. L. W. Setrell, Jr., of Crescent avenue, and her brother, James Chilton, of East Orange, were driving on Central avenue, yesterday afternoon, the horse turned a corner too short and Mr. Chilton was thrown out. He was driving at the time and pluckily hung to the reins, probably preventing a runaway. His injuries were but slight.

Boy Thieves Will Plead Guilty.

Charles Wilson and Louis Milligan, the two fifteen-year-old boys, of this city, who stole $1,000 from Mrs. William Cortright, of West Fifth street, and were captured in Washington, D. C., will enter pleas of guilty in the county court tomorrow.

THE CONSTITUTIONALIST.

VOL XXIX. PLAINFIELD, N. J., THURSDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1896. NO. 51

"Support the Constitution, Which is the Cement of the Union, as Well in Its Limitations as in Its Authorities."—Madison.

FAVORS A NEW COUNTY.

FARMER ORATOR BELIEVES PLAINFIELD SHOULD BE A COUNTY SEAT.

It is Not a New Question, For Twenty Years Ago the County of Central Was Proposed—Will Come in the Future.

A Press reporter today asked J. E. Martine what he thought of the project of a new county.

"I have long been in favor of such a movement," he said, "and believe it would be of great advantage to Plainfield. The notoriety and publicity that a county seat would bring would materially advance all interests."

"But would there not be opposition from Elizabeth and the rest of the county?"

"Naturally, yes. They would regret to lose Plainfield. And so would Somerset county regret to lose North Plainfield, but notwithstanding all this I believe it will be brought about ultimately."

"Would you not take in a part of Middlesex county?"

"Certainly, and I believe that old Middlesex would rebel but little. I feel quite sure that the population in that portion proposed to be annexed would hail it with joy. The extending of streets and roads, the construction of bridges and the like would be simplified and be much more satisfactory within one county than it is at the present."

"How about the political aspect of the situation?"

"Ah! Ah! There is small choice in rotten apples. Viewed from the result of the last election I don't see that we Democrats could be any worse off—though I confess for many reasons I should dislike to cut away from old associates in other parts of the county, but then a matter of this character should be viewed in a broad light, and not from a political standpoint."

"This is a new question for Plainfield, is it not?"

"Bless you, no! Some twenty years ago I caused to be published in The Constitutionalist a notice that application would be made to the session of the Legislature for the formation of a new county from parts of Union, Somerset and Middlesex counties, the same to be known as the county of Central, with Plainfield as the county seat."

"Where would you draw the lines to embrace the new county?"

"Oh! That would have to be a matter of much deliberation. I have a general idea, but no definite thought on this."

"Do you believe the matter will come up this winter?"

"No! It will be slow. It is a question for agitation and education, but I believe it will come."

His Stolen Watch Recovered.

The house of Jacob Peterson, a farmer near Raritan, was robbed early in November, and among the articles taken was a gold watch. No trace of the thieves could be found, but recently Mr. Peterson recovered the watch in a strange manner. Jas. Lahey last week was killed by the night freight near the Raritan station of the Central Railroad. When his body was found and County Physician Wagoner searched his clothes he found a watch which a county detective recognized as resembling the description given by Peterson of the one stolen from his house. Subsequently Peterson identified it as his property. Lahey's friends say that he purchased it from some man, whom they do not know.

GALA DRESS OF YULETIDE

HIGH SCHOOL ELABORATELY DECORATED FOR CHRISTMAS TIME.

Each Class Had a Hand in the Trimming and a Pretty Sight the Combination Made—A Funny Poem for the Occasion.

A lively place is the Plainfield High School at Christmas time, for every class room decorated for the occasion and there is an air of expectancy about the scholars that increases as the time draws nigh for Christmas vacation.

The interior of the building looked very pretty, indeed, Wednesday while Assembly hall wore a gala dress the like of which was never seen there before. Instead of the Senior class alone decorating the hall, the Seniors and Juniors combined their efforts and the result was very charming. All along one side above the folding doors into the class rooms the class of '98 had draped their colors, light blue and yellow. The Senior class had the position of honor for their colors. Blue and white bunting was draped about the platform and on the wall behind. The American flag was hung behind the desk while over it hung the blue and white of '97, and a beautiful star of white and gold with '97 in the centre of it was placed in the middle of the flag.

Ninety-eight had charge of the decorations in the first class room which included bunting and drawings on the black board. The members of the class of '99 decorated the other class room very prettily. They selected as their colors, red and white, the same as those of the famous class of '95. Bunting was draped about the chandelier and sides of the room while the boards also wore a holiday dress. The mascot of the class, "The Yellow Kid," smiled at his friends from one of the front boards.

The members of the Fourth class, or the "Naughty Naughts," as they are called, decorated one of their class rooms on the second story. Their colors are red and dark green, and the holly branches were used to great effect. Red bunting was stretched across the room, while the boards were in harmony with the rest of the room. This room was thought by many to be the prettiest in the building.

Very little evergreen was used in the decorating, and that was by the seniors in arranging the platform.

The members of the Third class had their present for the Fourth class in the shape of two baby rattles which were hung on the wall of the Fourth class room. They were accompanied by some verses, printed on a large sheet of paper and written for the occasion by the poet of the class, Tom Muir. Tom is employed in the circulating department of The Daily Press, and is known among his schoolmates as the wit and poet of the school.

The verses were as follows:

TO THE FOURTH CLASS.

Christmas comes but once a year,
And this one's almost due.
So, infants, we are going to give
A souvenir to you.

But children are such artless things,
They only laugh and prattle.
And being such, we give to you
The pretty little rattle.

The exercises were held this morning, and they were attended by a large number of graduates and friends of the school.

The programme, as published in Tuesday's Daily Press, was followed out and greatly enjoyed by all. The singing was especially fine, and much improvement was noticed, especially by graduates, to whom great praise was given to Mr. Lewis for his excellent work there. Some of the selections were difficult, but they were given without a break, while the volume of voices was noticeable.

Rev. J. O. McKelvey was the speaker of the morning and made a few remarks appropriate to the occasion. He spoke on the future and how each one is the architect of his or own fortune and the necessity of system, concentration and perseverance, in order to be successful. He also spoke of the moral future and how the world wants men and women of character.

After the exercises, the senior and junior classes adjourned to the laboratory where the seniors presented the members of the other class with their Christmas present. There was somewhat jumpy for each and with it a humorous selection of a few lines. Sydney R. Titsworth, president of the senior class, presented the different gifts with a few appropriate words.

Miss Gilbert of the Franklin School, had some charming exercises and beautiful pictures in her room the afternoon at two o'clock.

Christmas at St. Mary's.

The first service in St Mary's church on Christmas morning will be at 6 o'clock, and will be a high mass. The other masses will be at 7:30, 8:30, 9:30 and 10:30 o'clock, the same hours as on Sunday. At 10:30 special music appropriate to the great festival of Christmas will be rendered. The choir will have additional singers, and an orchestra will also assist at this service.

REAL WINTER WEATHER

MORE SNOW FALLS TO MAKE EXCELLENT CHRISTMAS SLEIGHING.

This Storm Was a Gentle One and Flakes Fell Into Just the Right Spot to Make the Steel Runners Slip Easily.

Plainfield has seen more of real winter weather during the last month than for several years in the same period of time. Another snow storm arrived Tuesday afternoon at about five o'clock and has covered the first fall of snow with several inches more of the light feathery flakes. The first storm was accompanied by a biting north wind that swept the snow up in big drifts but the storm was a gentle one, the snow falling quietly and easily in fine flakes which soon covered the sidewalks and bare spots on the roads.

It was just what the lovers of sleighriding have been hoping for as the other storm left a fine bottom on which two or three inches of snow was needed to make glorious sleighing. And then it appears as if Plainfield was at last to have a real "white Christmas" such as she has not seen for many a year.

Although the snow was dry and fine, it clung to the trees and soon transformed the city into fairyland, all robed in white in honor of the approaching holiday. The pedestrians who were out in the storm did not find it unpleasant as the temperature was very moderate, but they were soon robed in white for the snow clung to coat and wrap and soon transformed the wearer into a living snow man. About eight o'clock in the evening the snow ceased and the stars came out but it was but for a few minutes and soon they disappeared from view and the snow began to fall with steady vigor. There was another lull in the storm this morning early but again it resumed for a time.

At seven o'clock, four inches of the white mantle had fallen and the sleighing was excellent. The mercury was at 26 degrees above zero and there was no wind to disturb the snow laden trees.

The snow plows of the street railway were on duty early in the morning and the cars according to schedule time at an early hour. The trains on the Jersey Central Railroad were not delayed by the storm.

G. A. R. POST INSPECTED

WINFIELD SCOTT POST MADE A SPLENDID SHOWING.

After the Official Business the Meeting Was Thrown Open to the Relief Corps and S. of V.—A Jolly Time Was Enjoyed.

The annual inspection of Winfield Scott Post, No. 73, G. A. R., took place Tuesday in their rooms on East Front street. Inspecting Officer Stryker, of Gen. Wadsworth Post, Somerville, performed the work of inspection and all the visitors agreed that they had never seen the work done in such an excellent manner.

After the inspection the meeting was thrown open and a large delegation from the Woman's Relief Corps and Sons of Veterans was escorted to the room where the festivities of the evening were enjoyed.

The first number on the programme was a vocal solo by Miss Jomini, entitled "Marching Through Georgia." She was accompanied on the piano by Clifford Braider. Another solo, "Brave Boys Were They," by Miss Jomini, was accorded hearty applause.

Then came the speechmaking, which was opened by Department Commander Ernest C. Stahl, of Trenton, who gave an interesting address on the work of the Grand Army. Department President, Mrs. Mary Morse, of the Woman's Relief Corps, followed with a few well-chosen remarks. Other remarks were made by Junior Vice Commander Hader, of Bloomfield; Department Inspector Hand, of Atlantic City; Chief Mustering Officer Askfeld, of Trenton; Assistant Inspector General James Atwood, of Trenton; J. Kentz, member of National Council of Administration; Past Commander L. V. F. Randolph, of Post 73

After the speechmaking all retired to the banquet room when a fine collation was served by the members of the Relief Corps.

The visitors left for home on the 1:17 train this morning, thoroughly pleased with their visit to this city.

A Clue to Postoffice Robbers.

A clue that may aid in capturing the robbers who looted the Cranford postoffice on Saturday was found Tuesday. The brace and chisel left behind by the thieves were identified as the property of F. E. Miller, a carpenter at Aldene. These tools were stolen from Miller's shed on Friday night. Three strangers were seen loitering near his house that afternoon. Good descriptions have been secured of them and furnished to the police.

ROBBED A COAL DEALER.

W. H. COLES' SAFE BLOWN OPEN AT DUNELLEN WEDNESDY MORNING.

The Sound of the Explosion Deadened by Bags of Feed Piled Around the Safe—Valuable Papers and Some Money Taken.

Wednesday burglars visited Dunellen who were evidently of the depraved and most dangerous class. At 2:30 o'clock this morning George Richardson, who lives nearly opposite to Wm. H. Cole's coal office, was rudely awakened from his slumber by a muffled report, and getting up looked out of his side and back windows, thinking perhaps that Dealaman's store had been broken into again. He saw nothing unusual, although the night was comparatively light, and returned to bed.

In the morning when Mr. Cole's colored driver went to the office he found the place in perfect confusion. The padlock on the front door had been cut and the bolts on the back door pried off, giving both a means of entrance and exit for the burglars. On the floor were scattered around many papers, receipts, etc., some valuable and some worthless. The safe had been drilled open and two of the drawers in it, in which were kept valuable data, including church documents and other papers, removed.

Bags of feed had been taken from a rear room and piled around the safe. Two of the compartments in the safe are missing along with their contents.

There was a considerable amount of money in the safe, and this was, of course, taken, but the robbers evidently had some respect for Mr. Coles for they left his account books without mutilation.

The main loss is the church insurance policies and Mr. Coles' papers, some of which are in connection with the Dunellen Building and Loan business. But of course payment on all of these can be easily stopped.

The only clue left behind was a carpenter's chisel with the name "Isaac Lyons" on it. Mr. Lyons is erecting a new house for Dr. Nelson, at New Market, and it is believed that the tools were stolen from there. Chief of Police Bowden was notified of the robbery early in the morning, but as yet he has been unable to get any trace of the thieves, though several suspicious looking persons have been seen.

LEGISLATURE'S WORK.

SENATOR VOORHEES TELLS WHAT WILL BE DONE AT TRENTON.

He Says That He Believes the Session Will be a Short One—Thinks the Constitutional Amendments Will be Approved.

More Senators and Assemblymen were at the State house in Trenton yesterday than on any day since election. They went for work, and before evening practically settled the organization of both Houses.

It was the first appearance of Senator Voorhees, and he will be the leader of the majority again this year. He has the following to say concerning the work of the session:

"I believe the session will be a short one, not over ten weeks, and the volume of legislation small. Much of it will depend on the report of the Commissioners of Equalization, to codify the Borough laws, and purify the Passaic. Track elevation may be up again, and I believe the constitutional amendments of the last session will be approved. It is certainly the best we can get, and further delay means no amendments at all, as a constitutional convention will not be permitted by the smaller counties, which would lose control of the Senate by such a move; and although that is what we should have, I think we had better accept what we can get now than nothing at all.

"The only logical excuse for delay would be to provide for district representation in the House, but that was defeated by the larger counties last year. I suppose the usual flood of special measures will appear, with Essex and Hudson in the van, but I do not think they will occasion much delay.

"Bills looking for appropriations for armories and the like might as well be kept at home, for while we have an ostensible treasury surplus of $1,000 000, it is only enough for a working fund."

In conclusion the Senator added that from what he could learn the Senate Investigating Committee would be continued, and that it would probably find more work than it had last year.

Gov. Griggs said he hoped Senator Voorhees was correct in his surmise of a short session, but added that he had serious doubts in that direction. He agreed with the Senator in his views on treasury raids, and said that bills with that object in view would hardly reach the statute books.

A CHRISTMAS FESTIVAL.

GAYETY FOR THE CHILDREN OF HEAVENLY REST CHURCH.

A Mother Goose Reception Was One of the Features, and After the Programme Presents Were Given Away.

The parish house of the Church of the Heavenly Rest, Evona, was the scene of activity and gayety, Tuesday afternoon and evening, when the children's Christmas festival and "Mother Goose" reception was held. The weather and the bad walking kept some away, but there was, nevertheless, a good attendance.

The "Mother Goose" reception was arranged by Mrs. Lines, as was also the "broom drill," both of which were most successfully carried out. In the "broom drill" there were ten boys and ten girls, together with eight of the older girls of the school, and the various evolutions and changes through which they passed showed precision and marked training. The balance of the musical and literary part of the programme included a song by Miss Alice Ashworth, recitations by the Misses Lizzie Hendry, Agnes Van Norden, Nellie Arthur, Agnes Hendry, Anna Pierce, Grace Conkling and Ernest Ashworth. Following the above was a brief address by the superintendent, Wm. Winans Moore, and the distribution of handsome boxes of choice canky, church-like in appearance, calendars and Christmas cards. Special gifts of work boxes were given to the members of the sewing class.

Among the most prominent ones who took part in the Mother Goose entertainment were: Miss Ruth Lyons, as "Miss Muffet;" Erick Van-Norden, as "Little Jack Horner;" Miss Nellie Morgan, as "Little Boo-Peep;" Eddie Ashworth, as "Little Boy Blue." Harry Wyckoff impersonated "Dr. Foster," and George Stiles, "Chas. Wagg." "Little Daffy Down Dilly" was shown by Miss Agnes McNaughton.

The table for the sale of fancy articles was presided over by Mrs. Graves, while Mrs. Morgan was in charge of the chocolate table. The committee of arrangements consisted of Mrs. B. Lewis, Mrs. Graves, Mrs. Morgan, the Misses Graves and Miss Wenzel.

At the close of the entertainment ice-cream, coffee and cake were served in abundance to all present.

Bright and Cheerful.

The Commercial Palace never appeared more bright and cheerful than it does this season. Filled, as it is, to overflowing with the prettiest, tastiest and most attractive Christmas novelties and useful articles ever shown by this most popular house before, and sold at such low prices as to meet the smallest purses. Edsall's has well-earned the popularity and success it enjoys today.

—There will be prize bowling for turkeys on Christmas and New Year's eves at the alleys in the Ulrich building, on East Second street.

The old lady was right when she said the child might die if they waited for the doctor. She saved the little one's life with a few doses of One Minute Cough Cure. She had used it for croup before. L. W. Randolph, 143 West Front street.

Mr. Dunn Sues for $25,000.

Former Congressman John T. Dunn, of Elizabeth, has begun a suit in the Supreme Court at Trenton, for $25,000 damages against the Merchants' Insurance Company of Newark for injuries he received in an elevator accident in the company's building several months ago. The accident came near proving fatal to Mr. Dunn. He was laid up for months and has not fully recovered.

Improving in Strength.

Rev. Cornelius Schenck, PhD., who is at the Laurel House, Lakewood, is steadily gaining strength at that most excellent health resort and will remain there until Thursday of next week when he will return to Plainfield. On the following Sunday, Jan. 3d, he expects to resume charge of his pastoral duties in Trinity Reformed church.

A Stag Gathering.

An informal "stag" gathering was held at the home of Charles B. Morse, of Franklin place, Monday in honor of his birthday. A game of progressive hearts was played at which the first prize was won by Everett J. Peck. Carl D. Pfender took the second while the consolation prize was awarded to Wilbur F. Cornell. Parlor football and several other exciting games occupied the rest of the evening with an intermission for refreshments and story telling.

—Randolph's drug store window on West Front street is filled with a large assortment of the finest brands of perfumes at reasonable prices.

STRUCK ON HIS HEAD.

A KALSOMINER LOSES HIS BALANCE AND TAKES A TUMBLE.

Garrett Smith Was the Workman and He Was Engaged in the City Hotel —Blood Issued From His Ears and Nose.

An accident of a very serious nature occurred in the City Hotel Tuesday afternoon, in which Garret Smith, a painter and kalsominer, was dangerously if not fatally injured.

Some improvements were being made in the hotel and Smith had been employed to kalsomine the ceiling of several of the rooms. He was at work yesterday afternoon on his scaffold in the room alone. In some way he fell; it is supposed that he lost his balance when leaning too far backward. He struck on the back of his head and the blood spurted from his nose and ears. Other people in the building heard the noise when he fell and rushed to his side. He was unconscious when he was picked up and Dr. Long was summoned at once. It was impossible to tell at first what effect the fall had had except that he was injured internally. A hack was summoned and the injured man taken to his home. Mr. Smith resides at 676 West Third street and is a painter by trade. He works on his own account.

Dr. Tomlinson was called to attend Smith at his home. Smith is still in a partially conscious state and the doctor says that the shock has caused a complication of troubles in his head. The injury is a serious one, but not fatal, he says.

ONLY A POINT BEHIND.

Y. M. C. A. Basket Ball Team Defeated By a Small Margin at Summit.

Since their recent crushing defeat by the second team from the Twenty-third street branch of the New York Y. M. C. A., the basket ball team of the Plainfield association has rather lost interest in the game, but last night the excellent showing made by the team has brought back all the old time enthusiasm.

The game was played in the gymnasium of the Summit Y. M. C. A. against the first team of that association and the final score stood 11 to 10 in favor of the home team.

The baskets were not of the regulation height and the visitors were not accustomed to the place. The Summit boys had it all their own way the first half, when the score stood 7 to 2 in their favor. Then the Plainfield team began to get onto the game and the contest grew more exciting until when time was called, Plainfield was only one point behind. The Summit team played a rougher game than the visitors and four fouls were called on them against one called on the Plainfield team. The Plainfield team consisted of the following: Right forward, William Prugh; left forward, Max Moraller; centre, Eric Moraller; right guard, Henry Jessop; left guard, Frank Richards.

Minerva Temple Officers.

Wednesday the following officers were elected at the meeting of Minerva Temple, Rathbone Sisters: Past chief, Mrs. Bowman; most excellent chief, Mrs. Thatcher; most excellent senior, Mrs. Mattis; most excellent junior, Mrs. McComas; manager, Mrs. Pope; protector, Mrs. Bellis; guard, Mrs. Higgins. The officers will be installed January 6th.

Will Please the Children.

Next Tuesday evening the scholars of the Sunday-school of the Seventh-day Baptist church will hold their Christmas exercises. Besides the usual first-class musical and literary entertainment, for which the school is noted, there will be a general distribution of boxes of candy among the scholars and teachers.

Caught a Sleigh Runner in the Track.

A sleigh, in which were seated Miss Marie Martine, her friend, Mrs. Fredericks, and a driver, was wrecked Wednesday on the car tracks corner of Front street and Park avenue. The occupants of the sleigh were not injured and they alighted from the sleigh before any serious damage resulted.

Absolutely pure, perfectly harmless, and invariably reliable are the qualities of One Minute Cough Cure. It never fails in colds, croup and lung troubles. Children like it because it is pleasant to take and it helps them. L. W. Randolph, 143 West Front street.

Routine Business Transacted.

The Borough Board of Education met Monday and transacted routine business, which included the payment of all bills for the month. The board also officially received the immense quantity of clothing, flour, groceries, etc., which was donated by the borough citizens for the Children's Home, and they extended their thanks to all for their gifts.

SUDDEN, BUT EXPECTED

R. G. HORR DIES WHEN IT WAS THOUGHT HE WAS IMPROVING.

It Was Not Expected That He Would Live Long, Though His Demise at the Moment Came Without Much Warning.

Ex Congressman Roswell G Horr, statesman and orator, passed away at his home, 808 Park avenue, Friday evening at about 11 o'clock. The end came suddenly and without warning.

For some time Mr. Horr has been suffering with Bright's disease, but it was not until he returned, tired out with the last campaign, in which he played a very active part, that he was taken seriously ill. An acute attack of bronichitis made a dangerous combination with the kidney trouble. For nearly three weeks Mr. Horr lay between life and death; the doctors said that there was a chance that he might live and his family watched closely over him and hoped for the best. Several nights ago he began to sink and it was thought that the end was near at hand, but he rallied after Dr. Hedges had worked over him for several hours and slept comfortably for the rest of the night.

Yesterday he appeared to be gaining and talked with his family, seeming in very good spirits. Last evening Dr. E. W. Hedges came to the house and remained for several hours. Mr. Horr was sitting up in a chair as he seemed unable to rest on the bed. At ten o'clock he was taken with a spasm that lasted for a few moments. He all right then, however, and took some coffee and crackers with evident relish. Soon after that his daughter, Mrs. M. H. Eward, and her husband retired to their room while Mrs. Horr, Mr. and Mrs. F. H. Hebard, Frank A. Horr, and the doctor remained at the bedside conversing with the sick man. At about 11 o'clock he was taken ill with another spasm, more severe than the first. He complained of feeling faint and then his head drooped back and all was over. Mrs. Hebard had hurried to call Mr. and Mrs. Eward but before they could reach the beside the spirit had fled. The others were in the room at the time.

The other son, Rolland A. Horr, was telegraphed for at once and will arrive tonight or tomorrow. He was here at Thanksgiving time when he came east on his wedding trip and visited his father.

Roswell G. Horr was boru in Waitsfield, Vt., on November 26, 1830, but when he was a child his parents moved to Lorain County, Ohio, and it was in the Buckeye State that he spent his youth. He grew up a sturdy, industrious and ambitious young man, and improved all the opportunities he had to get a good education. He taught school in Lorain County to pay part of his expenses in Antioch College, from which he graduated in 1857. Before he left college he began making campaign speeches, and exhibited something of the ability which afterward made him known as one of the most effective stump speakers in the country.

He was a Republican at the birth of the party, and he took an active part in politics in his own county as soon as he left college. He was appointed clerk of the Court of Common Pleas in Lorain County, and served two terms. While he held the office he studied law, and in 1866 he was admitted to the bar. Instead of settling down to the practice of law, however, he went into Eastern Missouri and engaged in mining operations. He continued to speak in political campaigns, and in 1873 when he began the practice of law in East Saginaw, Mich., he took an active interest in the Presidential compaign, and made speeches in many parts of Michigan His reputation as a campaign orator gained for him a lucrative law practice.

In 1878 Mr. Horr was elected to Congress from the VIIIth Michigan District, and he was re-elected in 1880 and 1882. As a Representative in Congress he earned the reputation of being a fine debater, and a number of his speeches attracted widespread attention. His humor made his speeches most effective on many occasions. In an attack on a River and Harbor Appropriation bill he once convulsed the entire House of Representatives with laughter by pretending to urge the claims of some back-country mud creek for a large appropriation, and he made the entire country understand how ridiculously large were some of the items in the appropriation bill. On one occasion he replied to some personal ridicule directed at him by the late S. S. Cox, and the Congressman from New York was placed in such a ludicrous light that he lost his temper and declined to speak to Mr. Horr for several days. Mr. Horr was defeated for re-election to Congress in 1884, when he made campaign speeches in several States for Blaine and Logan, and neglected his own district.

In 1888 Mr. Horr made campaign speeches for Harrison and Morton in eleven States, and was unable to meet all the demands which were made for his services as a speaker in the campaign. After the election of General Harrison, Mr. Horr's friends urged his appointment to a foreign mission, but the only appointment that was offered to him was that of Consul at Valparaiso, which he declined. Although his friends felt that this treatment had been unjust, Mr. Horr exhibited neither mortification nor resentment, and in 1892 he made campaign speeches for Harrison in nine States.

Mr. Horr joined the Tribune staff about five years ago, and his signed articles in the weekly and semi-weekly editions of the newspaper attracted widespread attention. Many of his articles were republished in the daily edition. He wrote mainly on tariff and currency questions, but his replies to inquiries from every part of the country covered a wide range of topics. In a recent interview he gave the following account of the manner in which he turned out copy for the newspaper:

"When I am at home I dictate to my daughter, who takes it down as I talk it on the typewriter. But fully a third of my writing is done when I am away from home. In that case I dictate it to a stenographer, and revise his copy before I send it to New York. I generally go over my dictation carefully and make numerous interlineations. I have been in Oregon twice campaigning, and in Maine five times since I began to do this work, and I find it quite a task sometimes. I am working so hard now that for a short time I have given up writing almost altogether."

Early in the recent campaign the Republican National Committee made an earnest appeal for the services of Mr. Horr as a speaker in some of the western States, and he consented to make a tour of campaign speaking, with the understanding that he should be required to speak only three times a week. The demand for his speeches increased so rapidly, however, that during the greater part of the campaign he was speaking every day and often twice a day. At the close of the campaign he was worn out, and was prostrated easily by a combined attack of kidney trouble and bronchitis.

One of Mr. Horr's strong points as a campaign speaker was his readiness in answering questions when he was speaking. Any one who sought to confuse him by interrupting him to ask a question was reasonably sure to wish later that the question had not been asked. His replies were instantaneous, and generally were shot out like arrows tipped with lightning. They exhibited his readiness of humor, as well as his great memory and command of facts and figures.

Much public interest was manifested in a debate which Mr. Horr had with Senator Stewart, of Nevada, on the silver question in February, 1893. The debate was reported fully, and was published in a pamphlet by The Tribune. The pamphlet had a large sale. The Horr-Harvey debate in the summer of 1895 also attracted considerable attention, although the author of "Coin's Financial School" made no serious attempt to engage in the debate, but confined himself chiefly to reading extracts from a long essay which he had prepared.

Mr. Horr leaves two sons and two daughters. The sons are Frank H. Horr, of Ithaca, Mich., and Rollin A. Horr, of Saginaw, Mich. The daughters are Mrs. F. W. Hebard and Mrs. W. H. Ewart, both of this city.

Pit Holes Yawn For Hunters

Hunters who have sought game in the wilds of Morris county during the present season tell of miraculous escapes they have experienced from plunging down deserted mine shafts and unguarded pits. Some sections of the county are honeycombed with these man-traps. In some the original owners placed some sort of barrier about the mouths of the yawning holes, but that was so long ago that time and weather have destroyed the safeguards, and in nine cases out of ten deserted mine shafts and pits, varying from a few to hundreds of feet in depth, are standing menaces to life and limb of the unwary hunter or wanderer through the woods. In the vicinity of Chester and Hibernia these man-traps exist in numbers.

Carpet Works Resume.

The carpet works on South avenue, after a shut down of several months, will commence work at full capacity next Monday. Already a number of the old employes are at work on orders received a short time ago. A number of heavy orders are expected that will keep the looms running at full capacity for an indefinite time. Proprietor Bronson will give all the former hands employment.

Won The Prize.

Some time ago it was announced to the members of the Junior League of Grace M. E. Church by the pastor that a prize would be given to the most successful member in a Bible story competition. On Friday the competition ended and the prize, a very pretty stick pin, was won by Miss Carrie Pangborne.

Had to Walk His Horse.

A man from Westfield was driving down East Fourth street Friday in his sleigh when his runner caught in the car track and snapped. He patched it together the best he could and started to walk his horse all the way home. He refused to give his name.

ABOUT THE PEN PUSHERS

YOUNG PEOPLE HEAR AN INTERESTING TALK ABOUT JOURNALISM.

Joseph B. Lowden, City Editor of the Elizabeth Journal, Tells of Some of the Characteristics of Successful Reporters.

The young people's literary society of the First M. E. church enjoyed a rather novel and pleasing programme at their regular meeting Friday, when Joseph B. Lowden, city editor of the Elizabeth Journal, gave a talk on "Newspapers and Newspaper Workers." Mr. Lowden has been associated with newspaper work for many years, and he has gained much valuable knowledge which makes him an interesting speaker.

In the talk he gave last evening there abounded a great deal of genuine humor which was thoroughly enjoyed by all. Incidentally, he said that he did not know that he was to be the star of the evening by being the only speaker. Continuing, he said in part:

"Newspaper people are not different from other people, though they are wonderfully made. Journalism is almost as old as time though it did not attain to any great degree of success in the early history of England. The first American newspaper was published in Boston by John Harris, and the paper was not a great success, from the fact that it began to publish a list of all the liars in the town.

"Newspaper men have a varied experience, and a reporter, if a good one, is vigilant. Many young men, as reporters, are dashed on the rocks of newspaperdom by allowing themselves to yield to temptation. The reporter becomes the associate of men far above and below him in life, and he has to be watchful in his business.

"Few people know when they are reading their paper what dark valleys had to be passed to obtain the news and what dangers were encountered.

"Invariably newspaper men do more good work than detectives, as Inspector Byrnes or Chief Grant will admit. There is a story told about a widow, who, after her husband's death, sold some goods to a peddler. Among the goods was a Bible in which was contained considerable family history The widow did not know that she had sold the Bible, until one day the peddler returned with it and wanted to sell it to her. She replied by saying that she did not want it, as The Plainfield Daily Press told her all that she wanted to know. The above story illustrates how a person will become attached to their paper and will have nothing else. When a reporter is given an assignment he is supposed to cover it, and if he is a good reporter he will do so."

Mr. Lowden gave several incidents of how reporters surmounted difficulties in obtaining news. He said that he was once a reporter and he liked to speak in praise of them, and he concluded his remarks by saying that a reporter should be honest, and if he is sure that he is right he should then go ahead.

Previous to Mr. Lowden's talk, Charles H. Angleman sang two pleasing solos, accompanied by Miss Sharp, on the piano, and at the close he rendered two comic songs, all of which were accorded hearty applause. Mr. Lowden was also extended the hearty thanks of the society for his enjoyable talk.

Miss Angleman, as chairman of the literary committee, occupied the chair and introduced the speaker of the evening.

A very delightful pink luncheon was given Friday by Mrs. Augustus D. Sheppard, at Hanwood, in honor of her sister, Miss Mead, who recently returned from Europe.

ADVOCATES NEW COUNTY

W. E HONEYMAN WOULD LIKE CONSOLIDATION BY SUCH A METHOD.

Thinks That Borough and City Should be One in Government as it is in Other Things if the Tax Problem Can be Adjusted.

Among the valued opinions which The Daily Press has already published, regarding borough and city annexation, the following from Rev. W. E. Honeyman, of Lincoln place, secretary of the Borough Board of Health, will be read by many with a great deal of interest.

When Mr. Honeyman was asked what he thought of annexation, he replied that he was much inclined to think the same as Senator Reed. Continuing, Mr. Honeyman spoke in part as follows:

"Two governments in places so nearly joined as the city and borough do not offer the best possible advantages that are to be obtained from a single government.

"In the first place, there are difficulties existing between the two Boards of Health, which would be obviated if we were one city, and then there is the saloons. In the borough they can keep open all night, while in the city they are forced to close at 11 o'clock in the evening. Under one government these institutions would be managed far better. As it is now, after 11 o'clock in the evening the borough is a receptacle for a class of undesirable people who make the night hideous after they have visited our saloons. In a great many respects our interests are one, and yet the simple question of taxes is the all important consideration. If this question can be settled satisfactory I can see no reason why there should not be a union. I think the sewer question could be solved and adjusted amicably, though at present there seems to be a dispute as to the success of the city's system of sewage.

"I would not be in favor of having the borough annexed to the city, but I would heartily endorse an action that would make a new county and have Plainfield as the county seat. Such places as Dunellen, South Plainfield, Scotch Plains, Fanwood, ought to be united with the city and borough in one county. It would be contrary to reason to suppose that the Legislature would take a step further and annex it to a much stronger one when there is no urgent necessity for it. But after all the question hinges on the taxes. If, by annexation, our taxes our going to be higher we might better remain where we are, and I doubt if you could get a corporal's guard to vote for higher taxes, for the purpose of being annexed. If our taxes would remain the same proportionately there is nothing that I can see to block annexation.

"There are many good reasons why there should be a new county as I have stated above, for we would be able to legislate directly for bests interests of the people and we would be able to handle many important matters, which now left to people who are entirely ignorant of our needs."

THE PYTHIANS CHOOSE OFFICERS.

Perseverance Lodge Honor Members by Giving Them Chairs.

The annual election of officers was the most important business to be transacted at the meeting of Perseverance Lodge, No. 74, K. of P., Friday evening. The election resulted as follows: Master of work, Thomas Milliken; chancellor commander, Robert Jackson; vice-chancellor, Edwin Mackey; prelate, William Young; master-at-arms, Donald McInnes; inner guard, J. Van Dyke; outer guard, James Armstrong; keeper of records and seals, Charles McGinley; master of exchequer, M. Turton; master of finance, John Wakefield; representative to the grand lodge, Jacob Blimm, Jr.; alternate, A. D. Pope; trustees, for three years, A. D. Pope; for two years, George H. Clash; for one year, Donald McInnes.

There was one candidate on whom the third rank was worked and then the members enjoyed a smoker, which was interspersed with an informal programme of talks and recitations. The evening proved to be a very delightful one.

Odd Ladies Officers.

At a recent meeting of Mizpah Lodge, No. 1, United Order of Independent Odd Fellows, Mrs. Cox was elected junior representative and Mrs. Mattis, Junior representative to the Government Lodge at Boston. Monday night, December 28th, the lodge will elect officers for the ensuing year.

An Early Hour For Service.

On the new glass sign just placed at the corner of Chatham and Somerset streets, noting the hours of service at Warren Chapel, it is noticed that there is preaching on Sundays at 1.30 a. m., which is, of course, a mistake. The error will be rectified.

Wm. Sperry, of Cumberland, Md., is visiting his mother in this city.

Mr. and Mrs. P. F. Phillips, of Madison avenue, and their daughter, Miss Mabelle Phillips, have returned from Wellesley where Miss Phillips is attending college. Miss Phillips has returned to spend her holiday vacation at home.

NOT A HENPECKED MAN

MARRIED FELLOWS BOWL LIKE FIENDS AT THE PARK CLUB.

Single Men Were Good For Only One Frame—Then Their Opponents' Mascot, "The Yellow Kid," Unnerved Them.

"The Yellow Kid" was all powerful at the bowling alleys of the Park Club Saturday night and the Benedict team, which chose him as their mascot, came out ahead in the first game of the series with the Bachelors of the club. It promised to be an exciting game at the start but the Benedicts rolled much better than anyone, including themselves, while the strong team from the Bachelor ranks went to pieces with few exceptions.

This series of games between the Bachelors and Benedicts has become an annual event at the club and is looked forward to with great interest. So it was not surprising that the alleys were lined Saturday night with the members and their families who had come over to see the first game of the series. The sympathies of the audience were about evenly divided, the wives and members of the older set favoring the Benedicts while the young ladies and junior members encouraged the other team. But as the game went on and the poor Bachelors began to sink deeper and deeper in the mire of defeat, many of the gentler sex changed their allegience and tried to encourage the weaker side.

The game did not begin until 8:30 o'clock and before that everybody had to have a look at the mascot of the Benedicts, which adorned the wall above the score board. It was the famous "Yellow Kid," and like the others of its family, it existed only on paper. It was a real "Yellow Kid," however, the features were too familiar and the inscription that adorned its yellow gown was of the usual nature. "Say ?" it said, "we won't do a ting to dem. I'm the mascot for de married mens of the Park Klub. See! Wate till ye see me roll, de Bachelors won't be in it." And the "Yellow Kid" told the truth.

At the appointed hour, VanBuren and Lyman rolled a practice ball and then opened the game for their respective sides. Everybody felt good as both teams had decided to win the game and they informed each other of the fact. Every man on both teams came in for his share of the comments and jokes that were flying about on every hand but Pete Matthews seemed to have more than his share. He appeared on the scene in his famous "eighty-nine cent" sweater which played such a prominent part in the football season. The moment he took his position at the head of the alleys it was the signal for the breaking out of the most remarkable noises. Everybody had something to say and the result was deafening. That was a starter for the rooters and they continued without cessation for the next five frames. First the Bachelors opened the campaign with a yell but once was enough as the luck began to change. Then the Benedicts delivered an original composition that caused even the "Yellow Kid" to smile. It ran

"One, two, three,
Who are we?
We are the married men,
Hully-gee."

One of the ladies wanted to know the meaning of the last expression, but her question was lost in the uproar and no one happened to find it, so this remarkable phrase remained unexplained. As the game continued and the pitying ladies turned to the victims of the married men, the Benedictine rooters changed the yell to

"One, two, three,
Who are we?
The ladies are against us,
Hully-gee."

Then the Backelors put their heads together and concocted the following, which was given with great feeling:

"We are the Bachelors,
Here us yell!
Who are the Bachelors?
What ? eh!!"

Everybody present was appropriately shocked by this and the Bachelors rolled poorer than ever. The lead of the Bachelor team had continued for only the first frame and then the married men began to gain. Their third frame was remarkable, only one Benedict breaking. Councilman J. C. Peck rolled a wonderful game in his usual dignified manner, while Edwin Douglass, of the house committee, swept down the pins until his friends grew frightened at the terrible way in which he was rolling, breaking all his previous records.

The individual scores were as follows:

Benedicts.		Bachelors.
Lyman	143	Van Buren	165
Hageman	173	Bonron	188

HURLED A PIECE OF LEAD

DENNIS RAGAN LET HIS ANGER GO TO FAR IN SNOW BALLING.

Struck With a Snow Ball Thrown by George Townley and Retaliated With a Junk of Lead—Townley Was Severely Injured.

George Townley, of the borough, an employe at the Pond Tool Works, narrowly escaped fatal injury Saturday afternoon last during the hour, when with several other employes, among whom was Dennis Ragan, was in the yards throwing snow balls. All present were indulging in the sport, when suddenly Ragan was hit rather hard with a snow ball thrown by young Townley. In an instant Ragan became angry and went for Townley. The latter ran behind a corner of the building to escape his pursuer. In the meantime Ragan ran to the shop and secured a piece of lead weighing three pounds. He returned in search of Townley, who was still behind the building. Just as the latter put his head out to see what Ragan was doing, the heavy piece of lead was thrown with full force.

It struck Townley square in the forehead, and beside inflicting a deep, ugly gash, the blow stunned him for sometime.

His comrades ran to his assistance, and found that he was losing considerable blood. They were frightened and as soon as possible they took him to the hospital where he was under treatment for two hours. From there young Townley went to the home of his sister, Mrs. Frank Manchester, on Lafayette place, where he remained on Saturday.

Ragan, the man who committed the act, was frightened after he realized what he had done, and he considers himself exceedingly fortunate that his deed did not kill Townley.

As yet it is not known whether any action will be taken against Ragan. Townley will not be able to work for sometime as he suffers a great deal from the injury and it will require considerable time to heel.

THEATRICAL.

The company which is announced to appear with Woolcott & Jackson's comedians at Music Hall Christmas afternoon, includes among its many fine such well-known and clever performers as McCabe and Cunningham, Frank G. Mack, John Cullen, Master Bobbie Lester, the Yellow Kid, Alda Woolcott, "Cute" MacDonald, Helen A. Furman, Sophie Clifton, LaBard and Byerson, Katherine Heath and Blanche Gordon. They will all be seen in L. N. Woolcott's "A Yellow Kid," a dramatic history, of the pranks and antics of that funny little fellow, Mischief Dugan, the famous Yellow Kid, whose pictorial pranks in the New York Sunday Journal and World have been the laughing consternation of the year.

"A Run on the Bank" will be presented at Stillman Music Hall next Saturday night by the Ward & Vokes company of thirty people. This means that the most gilt-edged farce comedy organization traveling is coming to Plainfield. Long before Ward & Vokes forsook the vaudeville they were regarded as among the best "teams" in the variety business, and when they made the step from vaudeville to starring honors, the reputation thus made was upheld by the policy of having nothing but the best and plenty of it. The result has been seen through two years of unparalleled success which they have enjoyed as stars.

FAIR PRIZES AWARDED.

Successful End of the Event Conducted by Engine Company No. 2.

The firemen's fair closed Saturday night after a week of flattering success. The fire laddies were accorded a great deal of patronage from their many friends, and there was hardly room to accommodate all who desired to attend. Those in charge are deserving of merit for the excellent manner in which they conducted the fair.

Before the fair closed Saturday evening several contests were decided. The beautiful doll was given to Miss Catherine Meeney, who guessed the name given which was Ida, Mrs. W. McKinley's first name. In the contest for the quilt, Wm. Townley proved to be the most popular fireman, by receiving 203 votes. Jacob Benner was given one pillow, he having drawn the lucky number 15. The one holding number 49 is entitled to the other pillow, and the person holding number 17 is entitled to the chair.

Jacob Benner presented the mode rack, which he won, to Miss Lottie Chamberlain.

The five dollar gold piece was presented to Eddie Britton, of East Second street, as he held the lucky number in the drawing which was 733.

—The Christmas service at the First Presbyterian church will be held next Sunday evening at 7:30. The choir will be assisted by an instrumental trio.

—Sam Soloman has moved his tailoring establishment from Park avenue, at the head of North avenue, to the Voehl building on East Front street.

THE CITIES OF JERSEY.

SOME OF THE PECULIARITIES IN THE WAY OF POPULATION.

A Dense Population in the North and Sparsely Settled Counties in the South Makes the State One of Many Contrasts.

The State census of New Jersey taken in 1885 showed the population of the State at that time to be 1,972,949. Since that time the population has increased about 125,000, and is now in the neighborhood of 1,800,000, or rather less than the population of the city of New York by the Board of Health figures. Newark has a population now estimated at 215,000; Jersey City has 180,000 people; Paterson, which is to furnish the United States with a Vice-President after March 4, 85,000; Camden, 65,000, and Trenton, the capital, 60,000. These are the five chief cities of New Jersey, and if to them be added Hoboken, famed in romance and pictorial narrative, with a population of 55,000, and Elizabeth, with one of 45,000, a total of 675,000 city population will be given, or nearly 40 per cent. of the total population of the State. It is south Jersey, sparsely populated and containing no larger city than Camden, which deprives New Jersey of what would otherwise be its distinction of being the State having the densest population. The nine counties of Southern Jersey represent very little in respect of the number of inhabitants. Burlington county, for instance, the largest in New Jersey, spreads over 860 square miles. It is nearly as large as the State of Rhode Island, but instead of including, as does the latter, a population of nearly 400,000, it contained by the last census only 8,000, transients in Mount Holly included. South of Burlington is Atlantic county, which includes Egg Harbor and Atlantic City. It has an area of 365 square miles (it is larger than New York county, Kings county, and Queens county combined,) and yet has a total population of only 30,000, about one-half of the present population of Long Island City.

Cape May county, further south, has an are of 255 square miles, but a total population of only 11,000, whereas one ward of New York city, the Twelfth, has a population in excess of 330,000. Cumberland, covering 506 square miles, with a population of only 45,000, and Salem, covering 340 square miles, with a population of only 25,000, are two other southern Jersey counties which help to deprive the State of what ought to be its prominence among the States of the country.

The total population of such Jerey cities as Newark, Jersey City and Hoboken, does not correctly represent the density of population in these places, for they are connected with suburban towns into which the population of the cities has flowed and which properly belongs to such cities even though not included within the official city lines. New Jersey is, indeed, a State of many contrasts. Large manufacturing cities and primitive rural settlements are both numerous, the former chiefly in the north, and the latter mostly in the south. It is a fact, not generally known, that the present State of New Jersey, or much of it, was once made over by the grantee, Lord Berkeley, to three trustees for the benefit of creditors. These trustees were William Penn of honored memory, Nicholas Lucas, and a third with the peculiar name of Gawen Lawrie. They held the State in trust and afterward divided it into two.

GEORGE HALLOCK ASSIGNS.

Names J. Fred MacDonald to Settle Up His Business.

George H. Hallock, the hatter and gents' furnishing goods dealer, made an assignment Friday a. m., through his attorney, John H. VanWinkle, naming J. Fred MacDonald as the assignee.

The hard times for the last two or three years has seriously affected Mr. Hallock's trade and finally compelled him to make an assignment. The assets and liabilities have not yet been determined. Mr. Hallock first associated himself in the business under the firm name of Hallock & Davis, the latter withdrawing from the business on November 28th, 1893. Ash Horton was the former proprietor of the store.

Stole a Harness.

Robert Hohenstein, a grain dealer of Westfield, reported to the authorities Thursday that his barn had been broken open some time Tuesday night and a set of harness stolen. About 2 o'clock in the afternoon James Harrison, who lives near Graceland, was making his way through the snow toward Westfield, when he kicked a sack that was covered up in the snow. Investigation showed that the sack contained a set of harness. On a piece of brown paper tied to one of the buckles was written: "This is the property of Robert Hohenstein, Westfield." When the harness was taken to Hohenstein he identified it as being his property. Why the person or persons who took the harness should abandon their plunder and attach the owners name to it is a mystery.

THE PRIZES AT TRENTON

LATEST LIST OF CANDIDATES AND THEIR CHANCES.

Candidacy of ex-Speaker Derousse Given a New Turn to the Gossip—Parker, of Passaic, Wants to be Assembly Clerk.

The candidacy of ex-Speaker Derousse for the place of Republican leader of the Assembly this winter gave a new turn to the gossip in the state-house corridors respecting the positions at the disposal of the Legislature. Assemblyman Lloyd, who is from Mr. Derousse's county, (Camden,) has been a candidate for the place, but not in an aggressive sense. He would like to have the honor, and says so, but Mr. Derousse is against him and this practically narrows the fight down to Derousse and Gledhill, of Passaic.

Ex-Assemblyman Parker, also of Passaic, is seeking re-election as clerk of the House, and he and Mr. Gledhill are opposed to each other. It now looks like a combination of Derousse and Parker for leader and clerk against Gledhill. Ex-Assemblyman Duncan, of Essex county, and Mr. Nutzhorn are both candidates for clerk. Major Lentz was at Trenton looking after Duncan's interests. There is talk of both Duncan and Nutzhorn being satisfied with minor places.

There is a disposition among some of last year's members not to re-elect reading Clerk Lyon's head. His pronunciation is not particularly adapted to making him acceptable in the position. The Morris members are working hard for Lyons, however, and he may not be turned down after all. Assemblyman Boll has a candidate in Hulskamper for Journal Clerk. If Parker is re-elected clerk, Duncan and Nutzhorn are likely to be considered in connection with the positions of reading clerk and journal clerk.

Andrew Briedenbach has four and six members behind him for re-election as Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, and his chances of getting his old place seem brighter than they were. George Sauple, who had the endorsement of the Essex members for Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms, is willing to take a doorkeepership, and this is what he will probably get if Briedenback is re-elected.

Senator Reed a Crack Shot.

Senator Charles A. Reed and his partner William A. Coddington, together with a few friends enjoyed a private shoot at live birds yesterday afternoon on the grounds of the Independent Scheutzen corps, in Hyde's Park. There were eighty live birds, and considering that they were strong birds, and the snow on the grounds, the score of sixty-eight out of a possible eighty was first class. Mr. Reed won first prize, and Mr. Coddington the second. A sweepstake at blue rocks followed the above shoot and some good scores were made.

PAYING FOR A VICTORY.

MAYOR-ELECT FISK DINES JAMES E. MARTINE, HIS OPPONENT.

Though Political Opponents They Are Warm Personal Friends and the Affair Was Full of Jest and Sociability

It is not often that the victor dines the defeated in the case of a candidacy for public office, but that is what was done Wednesday when Mayor elect Charles J. Fisk tendered a dinner to James E. Martine, the defeated Democratic candidate for Mayor, in the Union County Club. The affair was the outcome of a bandage of words in which the two Mayoralty candidates participated in during the progress of the recent campaign, and was very informal. Besides Mr. Fisk and Mr. Martine, there were a few other well-known local statesmen present, Republicans and Democrats both, and it was a jolly event taken altogether.

Though Mr. Fisk and Mr. Martine are political opponents loaded to the tip of the tongue with arguments against their respective ideas of public government, they are warm personal friends and last night the hearts of both were reached through the throat and stomach and pleasantry reigned supreme. Jests were interspersed all through the courses, but the privacy of the affair precludes the relating of any of the incidents.

The dinner was served by Max Wertz, and he fairly outdid himself in the lavish and novel menu that he provided for the occasion.

Death of Mrs. Frank L. Clark.

Mrs. Frank L. Clark, daughter-in-law of James Clark, of West Seventh s reet, this city, died Thursday at Asbury Park after an extended illness. Mr. and Mrs. Clark formerly resided in St. Louis, but have been staying at the seashore for some time in the hope that the change of air would benefit Mrs. Clark's health. She was well known and liked among many Plainfield people whom she had met while visiting at her husband's parents home. The funeral services will be held from her late home, 309 Third avenue, Asbury Park, this afternoon. The interment will be at Newton, Mass.

any longer. Meanwhile Adlemann's men had removed the snow from in front of the cars and under the wheels. After several unsuccessful attempts the three cars finally went ahead just as the fourth car appeared in the distance. The first car went forward immediately after being stalled in the snow for nearly three quarters of an hour. The fourth car plowed through the snow and reached the other side at the first attempt, after which one of the company's snow plows, drawn by two horses, which had arrived on the scene during the last of the excitement, went to work removing the rest of the snow from the tracks where it had been thrown.

Seeing that the fun was over most of the crowd moved on while Mr. Carey's men, who had completed their job, also left the scene.

MARRIED AT A PASTOR'S HOME.

Rev. G. Kennedy Newell Tied a Nuptial Knot Last Night.

A quiet wedding was celebrated Wednesday at the home of Rev. G. Kennedy Newell, of West Fifth street, when Miss Miriam Kendall, of Park avenue, and George Jacobson, of East Front street, were united in marriage by Mr. Newell. Miss Anna Johnson, of Mercer avenue, was bridemaid, and Frank Hatnand, of East Front street, was best man. After the ceremony a private reception was held in one of private dining rooms at the Central Hotel, where a fine supper was served.

The table decorations were especially pretty, and consisted of a variety of the choicest cut flowers. The bride and groom will reside in this city, where the groom works as a contractor. Early in January they will give a large reception in the Swedish hall. Those present at the wedding were Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Jacobson, of this city.

MOORE BAKER REMARRIED.

He Killed Two Negroes Who Murdered His Wife and Child in 1894.

Moore Baker, the young farmer of Franklin Park who on March 1, 1894, killed two negroes, after they had killed his wife and child, has been married in Philadelphia to Mary Burton, daughter of the late John Burton, a lawyer. Baker's quick vengeance on the murderers was the sensation of the day. They entered his house to rob it, and killed his wife and child with an axe.

Free Postal Delivery in Roselle.

There is now every prospect that Roselle will be among the number of towns that are to receive the benefit of the appropriation made at the last Congress for the establishment of experimental free delivery offices by the Post Office Department in small towns. Influential citizens and Congressman Fowler have urged that Roselle be among the towns designated, and an order for the free delivery service there is expected to be received soon.

GAGGED AND BOBBED.

Mr. and Mrs. John McGrath Have an Unpleasant Experience.

A highway robbery took place in Franklin Park, on the line between Somerset and Middlesex counties, is reported as having occurred early Thursday. Mr. and Mrs. John McGrath, of a small settlement known as the Sand Hills, were driving home on the road when two men drove up behind them. One of the men jumped from the carriage and seized the reins of McGrath's horse. The other drew a revolver and pointed it at the couple.

Mrs. McGrath screamed for help, and the man, still covering them with the revolver, then jumped from his own carriage and entered McGrath's. He gagged Mr. and Mrs. McGrath, who were powerless to resist. The two vehicles were drawn side by side and the highwayman transferred a large amount of groceries and merchandise to their own carriage. They also relieved McGrath of his gold watch and a small amount of money. They then drove away, leaving their victims gagged.

WAR OVER SNOW PILES.

TUNIS J. CAREY'S MEN BLOCKED THE STREET RAILWAY TRACKS

Superintendent Adlemann Arrives on the Scene and a Lively Time Ensues in Trying to Start the Stalled Cars.

There was trouble on the lines of the Plainfield Street Railway Friday morning and war seemed imminent between that corporation and Tunis J. Carey, the auctioneer and proprietor of the West Front street storage warehouse. The snow was at the bottom of the trouble and played an important part in the events of the morning.

When the snow storm ended, there was a big drift in the gutter on West Front street in front of Mr. Carey's building, which includes the four stores nearest the corner of Grove street. The drifts were increased in size by the snow from the sidewalk and Mr. Carey says that the snowplough used by the Street Railway Company banked it up much worse. Superintendent Adlemann, of the street railway, declares that the snow had been swept away from there by the wind and so the company had not had to remove it. At any rate, there was a high bank of snow in front of Mr. Carey's place that prevented his vans from approaching the entrance to the warerooms.

The snow, which was banked up at least four feet high, filled the gutter and so, when the police made their rounds this morning, Mr. Carey was notified that the snow must be removed from the gutter at once. Further down the street the company had carted away the snow from the side of the street, yesterday, but their carts had not come in Mr. Carey's neighborhood.

After the notification by the police, Mr. Carey ordered two of his men to dig away the banks of snow and throw the snow into the middle of the street. But it so happened that the car tracks were in the middle of the street also, and they were soon covered up by the lumps of packed snow. Most of the snow went on the west-bound track. The first car that came by pushed away the snow but by the time an other car came along there was a formidable bank of snow, about two feet deep, extending along the track for some distance.

The motorman looked dubiously at the obstruction and started his car at it. The car went about half way through the snow and then stopped. The wheels continued to revolve but the car remained stationary. Then he tried to back the car out of the snow but it was there too fast, and again the wheels revolved but the car moved not. Meanwhile quite a crowd had gathered to watch the fun and chaffed the motorman and conductor. Word was sent to Supt. Adelmann by telephone, and the crew retired to the inside of the car to await the arrival of help.

At last it came in the shape of another car and the two were coupled together. All the time Mr. Carey's men continued to pile the snow up in front of the stalled car. By the aid of the second car the first car was successfully backed up amid the cheers of the crowd which was rapidly assuming large progortions. Again the car tried to force its way through the snow and went several feet further; then had to be towed out by the second car. A third attempt was made and promised to be successful, when a back turned directly in the way of the moving car and the motorman was forced to stop the car or run down the hack. The crowd yelled gleefully at this and the car was stalled again.

This time, when the other car went to its assistance, it, too, was unable to move, and the crews of the two cars waited for reinforcements.

After a wait the third car showed up and unsuccessfully tried to assist the other cars. At the same time Superintendent Adlemann with several men from the car house, arrived, armed with shovels. They started to remove the snow from off the track, while the Superintendent came to the front.

"Stop throwing the snow on those tracks," he ordered. Carey's men looked around as if uncertain what to do.

"Throw that snow where you please," came from their employer who had taken up a position on the curb. Then Carey and Adlemann turned to each other and a lively conversation started. Mr. Adlemann told him he was delaying the traffic and would have to be responsible for it. Carey said that they could not pile up the snow and leave it in front of his property while the company's men carted it away in other places. Adlemann answered that if he had expected to cart away the snow there today as he did not have a chance yesterday and that, anyhow, the snow in front of Mr. Carey's place was not piled there by the street railway plows as there had been no snow on the tracks there, the wind having blown it all away. Mr. Carey didn't agree with him and their conversation soon came to an end.

Mr. Carey's men still continued to dig away at the bank of snow, but they did not throw it on the tracks Princeton intended to annex all the other universities some time in the future. The last year, Mr. Dennis said, was a great one for Princeton. This dream of greater Princeton might sound like a night mare but it showed the general trend of affairs and how the two universities are gradually drawing together, never, perhaps, to be initiated under the same faculty, but to go forward together.

"The Alumni" was answered by Dickinson W. Richards, president of the Essex County Yale Alumni Club. He brought, he said, the greetings of the oldest and most prolific alumni association in the country, which had, during the last decade, sent more freshmen to Yale per cubit foot of graduates, than any other association. What we need, he said, is not more men, but bigger ones, for only eleven men can go on the football field at once, and Princeton now has Grover Cleveland who pushed the entire English cabinet over the line. He then turned his remarks toward the college home of his listeners, and spoke of the changes there. The improvement in the faculty, he said during the last fifteen years was great, but he was not so sure about the students. He closed by expressing his thankfulness that he ever went to college, and especially to Yale.

Mr. Runyon's famous solo, "If I Were President," preceded the next speaker, James E. Roy, who answered to the toast "Our Club." He spoke of the fondness of Plainfield people for clubs and how the Yale men played an important part in many of them. The Yale Club, he said, is here to demonstrate the greatness of Yale in this city and her members impress it on all they come in contact with. He told of the growth of the club from thirteen members to forty-one after six years and said how well Plainfield has been represented among the under graduates at Yale.

The next senator from Somerset county, Chas. A. Reed, was called upon to answer to the toast "Rutgers College." He said that now Yale and Princeton were growing in numbers and wealth, they would soon topple over and give the smaller colleges, like Rutgers, a chance. He told something of his college and illustrated his remarks by several humorous stories.

A selection by a quartette of Yale Alumni men followed and then Councilman-elect William N. Runyon was called on to say something. He responded by telling some of his experiences at college and how he had now changed under the present environments. Then he grew facetious, and told the visitors about the beauties of the city park, near by, with all its beautiful statues and then of the city "jug," which he declared was a perfect paradise for the entomologist.

A parting toast to Yale and several college songs followed and then the toastmaster dismissed them.

SONS OF OLD ELI DINE.

ANNUAL DINNER OF THE PLAINFIELD YALE CLUB HELD LAST NIGHT.

The Event Took Place at the Revere House Which Was the Scene of a Gay and Festive Time by the Alumni of Yale.

Another year has passed by and again the sons of Old Eli gathered together for the annual spread. It was the fifth annual dinner of the Plainfield Yale Club and was held in the spacious dining room at the Revere House Thursday evening.

They talked and laughed over their experiences back in New Haven and sang the good old songs of that period. Everybody felt happy and an excellent repast served to make them more cheerful. Mr. DeRevere's chef felt that his honor was at stake and he prepared a sumptuous banquet.

The election of the officers of the club came early in the evening. Albert H. Atterbury was elected president of the club, H. L. Moodey, vice-president, and Arthur L. Tracy, secretary. The table was arranged in the shape of a large U reversed with the toastmaster and the invited guests across the end and the members of the club seated along the sides. Besides the toastmaster and the speakers, there were present the following:

The Messrs. Atterbury, Reed, Codding, Welles, Clark, Moody, Corbin, Dimock, Mann, E. Tracy, A. Z Huntington, J. E. Tracy, H. L. McGee, W. D. Murray, Knox, Foote, Ryee, W. H. Tracy, Raymond, P. Stewart, S. Huntington, Kean, Strong, Arthur Lovell, C. W. McGee, Opdyke, West, W. E. Stewart, Peck, W. M. McCutchen, H. B. Lovell, Yates, W. F. Murray, Stephenson, Richards, Price, Howard Huntington, Ryder, Whiton, Leal and Pardee.

The dining hall was prettily arranged for the occasion with American flags and the smaller Yale flags, while holly decorated the chandeliers and pillars with here and there a bunch of it hung around the walls. There were a few visitors present who arrived in time to listen to the speeches. After the dinner, interspersed as it was with songs, the graduates rose up and marched around the room in Indian file while they sang one of the famous Yale marching songs. Meantime the table had been cleared and cigars were passed around.

Soon tobacco smoke rolled upward in clouds and the sons of Old Eli settled themselves to enjoy the evening's speeches. S. St. John McCutchen, master of the toasts, rose from his place at the head of the table and in a few remarks, filled with his irrepressible funny sayings, reviewed the events of the last year at Yale and then introduced Thomas Thatcher, president of the Alumni Association of New York, who had for the toast "The University." He spoke words of greeting and referred to that wonderful power that is always to be found in a gathering of Yale men. Then he turned to his subject and spoke of the great growth in the university and what it now embraces. The development of character, he said, was greatly aided by the opportunities given by the university by the voluntary student initiative. Then he talked of the alumni, really a part of the university, and spoke of its right to act for and to criticise the university, which, he said, came by its love for the "old place."

"The Faculty" was spoken for by Professor Hadley, of Yale. He answered the toastmaster's little hits with equal wit and after he had sent his listeners into roars of laughter he turned to more serious subjects. The recent growth of the university was, he said, remarkable, considering their late losses and the hard times. The increasing numbers in the classes had, he continued, necessitated a change in the recitation method which has proved so successful in the past and regarding which the advice of the alumni is needed. Classical learning had maintained its old position. As regards the Democratic spirit at the university, wealth has given an increasing importance there as in the rest of the world, but not to such a great degree. Nevertheless, he said, the work in the university was going forward according to the fundamental principles.

After the applause had died away that followed these remarks, William N. Runyon was called upon for a song and responded with one of his dialect selections that was received with much hand clapping.

Yale's old rival, "Harvard," was the toast answered to by Edward C. Perkins, a graduate of that institution. He remarked on his isolated position among the host of Yale men. After a little pleasantry, he spoke of the two great universities marching forward in the walks of life, side by side.

Yale's younger rival, who proved so successful on the football field this year, "Princeton," was represented by Leonidas Dennis. He remarked that on account of her victorious career of the last year, he thought that she deserved a more worthy representative than himself. He had written to President Patton, and read a portion of his answer. The latter referred to the future and confidently stated that

THE NEW COUNTY IDEA.

There is probably nothing that would please the average Plainfielder better than to have city and borough consolidation accomplished by the formation of a new county with the Colorado of the East as the county seat, as suggested by Senator Reed and advocated by other borough citizens. There are sections of Union, Somerset and Middlesex counties that turn naturally to Plainfield as a center and to be compelled to travel to either Elizabeth, Somerville or New Brunswick to transact county business is not only an inconvenience but an aggravation to the residents of these particular points. If there is any way of pacifying the diversified elements to be encountered in the proposition to form a new county by the withdrawal of a small section from each of the other counties, it ought to be pushed. For the localities concerned, Plainfield would be a most satisfactory place for a county seat, and beyond the satisfaction that would result from a Greater Plainfield there would be much glory in knowing that we are not playing second fiddle in matters political to the Elizabeth politicians. Of course, just at present on the Republican side, Plainfield is faring very well, but honors were long delayed, and what the future may have in store may simply be what the past has been —a good deal of promise but little of realization. At any rate, with a new county and Plainfield as its capital, there would be no chances.

A NOBLE REVENGE.

Kansas intends to make New York and Chicago ashamed of the libel which they thrust upon her intelligence in public affairs during the last campaign. Kansas was, of course, the hot-bed of the free silver agitation, and the story was started that the business standing and prosperity of the State had been greatly impaired by the propogation of the isms of politics. Naturally, this story made the Kansas mind agitated and incensed, but just how they might retaliate with the effect of disabusing the mind of the country from that reflection on their astuteness, was much of a puzzle. Now, however, the opportunity presents itself in the touching story of want and suffering that comes from the poor of New York and Chicago, and Kansas newspapers are advocating that a few carloads of provisions be sent to these cities to prove that Kansas has enough, and some to spare, too, of the world's goods. It would be a noble revenge.

DEATH OF R. G. HORR.

By the death of Hon. Roswell G. Horr, which occurred Friday at his home in this city after an illness that has been at critical stages for sometime past, the public life of this country loses a figure whose political astuteness was a marked characteristic, quaint, aggressive and resourceful as it was; and Plainfield loses one of its most notable and honored citizens. In his private life Mr. Horr was a companionable man who made friends even among those whom he held up to criticism on the public platform and in the newspapers, to which he devoted his energies, by a wealth of knowledge and language. He was devoted to his family and the fact that his duties took him away from home much of the time seemed to incur in him a greater delight and appreciation of the family circle when it was his privilege to enjoy it. On all sides Mr. Horr's death is regretted.

The Middlesex county grand jury has made a presentment against the justices of peace charging that the county is constantly put to a heavy expense by these lower court officers entertaining trivial complaints, an evidence of which is the fact that out of 136 cases submitted to the Grand Jury only 43 were indicted.

It may be interesting to Plainfielders to know, since there has been so much trouble about the polluting of Green brook by running sewage into it, that the New York State Board of Health, has decided that hereafter no town will be permitted to empty sewage into a running stream.

After Christmas the exodus from Sunday-schools may be looked for. July and August with their excursions and December with her visit of Kris Kringle are great incentives for the rising generation to be constant in attendance at Sunday-school.

The most disagreeable thing about buying Christmas gifts is to choose what will be pleasing and serviceable to the recipient.

This is the time when progressive merchants find it pays to advertise, and liberally, too.

SAMUEL A. HAYNES DEAD.

SHOCK OF HIS DAUGHTER'S DEATH BROUGHT ON HEART FAILURE.

In the Far West When Mrs. C. P. Ralli Died and Did Not Learn of the Death Till Several Days After—Well Known.

The large circle of friends of Samuel A. Haynes, of Netherwood, will be shocked to learn of his sudden death, which occurred early Monday morning at his home in Indianapolis, of heart disease.

Mr. Haynes was the father of the late Mrs. Constance P. Ralli, of Netherwood, whose sudden death last week was such a shock to the community.

At that time Mr. Haynes was in the far west and it was several days before he could be reached by wire. When he received the sad news, he immediately returned to Indianapolis, arriving there Monday morning.

The shock of the death of his daughter was too much and he passed away suddenly, as above stated.

Mr. Haynes was president of the Samuel A. Haynes Company, of Indianapolis, prominent in the manufacture of bicycles. For many years he was a member of the hardware firm of Graham & Haynes, of New York, and he has always been a member of the Hardware Club, of New York.

He was well-known to many Plainfield citizens and delivered many temperance lectures in this city.

Only three weeks ago he spent several days in Netherwood with his daughter. He leaves a wife, daughter and son.

He was a man of the highest attainments and was loved and respected by all who knew him.

THE FIRE IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

A Loss of $350,000—The Theatre Destroyed.

The fire which broke out at 12:30 o'clock Sunday a. m. in the Allen Theatre building in New Brunswick, raged for nearly four hours, and when the flames were extinguished the damage caused was estimated at more than $350,000. The building was one of the largest in the city, extending 150 feet on George street and 220 on Albany street, and being of five stories. Besides the theatre, it was occupied by stores and the upper part was used for offices. The fire began with an explosion in the rear of the stage. Mrs. R. W. Hughes and Mrs. Charles Perkins, who live on Church street in the rear of the building, were aroused by the noise, and seeing the glare, gave the alarm.

Among those who had offices in the building and lost their property were:

Leonard Scheidig, restaurant in basement, $8,000; no insurance; a cash register containing $250.

The D K. E. Greek Society of Rutgers College students; records for thirty-seven years back burned, and $500 worth of other property.

Palestine Lodge, F. & A. M.; records and $1,200 other property.

The Common Council of the city of New Brunswick, $800.

New Brunswick Traction Company, $1,000.

Henry B. Baldwin, drug-store, ground floor, $2,000.

William McGovern, a cigar-dealer, $500.

J. B. Hickman, insurance agent, $200.

Harry B. Cook, lawyer, $300.

The burned thratre building was owned by the Newark Home Building Association, which purchased it from the Macons, who erected it in 1872 at a cost of $210,000. The McElroy Stock Company was to have opened for a week's engagement in the theatre this evening. Nearly all their trunks and scenery were in the theatre and these were lost. It is said that the building was insured for about two thirds of its value.

A BLAZE, BUT NO NEED OF AN ALARM.

An Oil Stove Thrown Into a Yard Brought Out Borough Firemen.

Sunday evening about 6 o'clock the borough fire department was called out in response to an alarm sent in from Box 152, at the corner of Linden avenue and Grove street, and the apparatus was out of the house on the second round of the box. The cause of the alarm was that an oil stove in the home of ex Chief Marshal J. W. VanHorn, of 171 Duer street, refused to work properly, and Mr. VanHorn threw the stove into the rear of the yard. A young boy saw the blaze and ran to the home of Mr. Lewis on Grove street, where he secured the key to send in the alarm.

The fire was extinguished before the department arrived, and they were not needed.

Some say that the hypophosphites alone are sufficient to prevent and cure consumption, if taken in time. Without doubt they exert great good in the beginning stages; they improve the appetite, promote digestion, and tone up the nervous system. But they lack the peculiar medicinal properties and the fat found in cod-liver oil. The hypophosphites are valuable, and the cod-liver oil is valuable.

Scott's Emulsion

of Cod-liver Oil with Hypophosphites contains both of these in the most desirable form. The oil is thoroughly emulsified; that is, partly digested. Sensitive stomachs can bear an emulsion when the raw oil cannot be retained. As the hypophosphites, the medicinal agents in the oil, and the fat itself are each good, why not have the benefit of all?

SCOTT'S EMULSION has been indorsed by the medical profession for twenty years. Ask your doctor about it. This is cause it is always palatable—always uniform—always contains the purest Norwegian Cod-liver Oil and Hypophosphites.

It will be easier to announce what is about to happen in the world, what tri umphs for good government are to be won, what advances of the people are to be made, what is to be the outcome of the continuous struggle in the United States of right and wrong, what I to happen in the far East, what is to be the fate of Europe twelve months hence, what new marvels of science are to be revealed, or what are to be the achievements of art and letters, for the WEEKLY is to be a pictorial record of all this.

Cartoons will continue to be a feature of the WEEKLY. The New Englander story by Miss MARY E. WILKINS, will begin in January. A tale of a Greek uprising against the Turks, by MR. F. F. MONTRESOR, the author of "Dodo," will follow. A sequel to "The House-Boat on the Styx," by JOHN KENDRICK BANGS, will be illustrated by MR. PETER NEWELL.

Short Stories will appear in the WEEKLY than it has been possible to publish during 1896.

Special features: Mr. W. D. HOWELLS's "Life and Letters" have been among the most charming features of the literary literature; Mr. E. S. MARTIN, and others will contribute entertaining essays during the year. "This Busy World," "Amateur Sport" will remain the most important department of its kind in the country.

THE HOSPITAL REPORT.

INTERESTING FACTS AND FIGURES ABOUT THE INSTITUTION.

The Operating Expenses for a Year Are Now About $6,000, and This Sum is Only Raised by Active and Hard Work.

The annual report of Muhlenberg Hospital for the year ending June 1, 1896 has just been issued, its publication having been unusually delayed.

The most interesting items of the report, in fact and figures, have already from time to time been published in the Daily Press. One of the most important, however, will bear repeating. The annual cash expenses of the Hospital are now about $6,000, and this amount does not include the various and considerable gifts of supplies and materials received and used.

The work of the Hospital constantly increases, and the character and quality of its service has recently been greatly improved. But this improvement of the service necessarily causes the cost to increase at a more rapid rate than the amount of work done.

The Woman's Auxiliary Board, upon whose shoulders rests to a great extent the domestic management of the Hospital, and which does a great deal in contributing and obtaining funds for its support, seems to be a very flourishing and popular association, its membership at the date of the report being 134, and having since increased.

Since the first of June, the date of the report, several events in Hospital matters have taken place. In September a great loss was incurred in the death of Mr. Erickson, the President of the Board of Governors, and in October G. H. Goddard was elected as his successor.

During the summer and fall the drainage of the hospital was connected with the public sewer, and for the first time, gas was introduced, the gas company laying 1800 feet of new mains for that purpose. The gas is of great advantage not only for light, but much more for use in heating, cooking and sterilizing in the wards, the dining room and in the medicine and operating rooms.

In October was finished and occupied the new detached laundry, built and equipped at a cost of $750, with a part of the funds left by the late Henry F. Sittes of Scotch Plains. This is one of the most important improvements ever made at the hospital, the laundry work having been done heretofore in a small and very unsuitable room in the basement of the main building. In September the constitution was amended to allow physicians not members of the medical staff to place patients in the hospital and treat them there—a new departure, which will, no doubt, win for the institution many new friends and give much satisfaction to all. The Nurses' Home which is now nearly completed, was begun on September 1, 1895, and is an ornament to the neighborhood in which it stands. It is to cost about $4,700, unfurnished. Of this amount $3,000 was appropriated from the proceeds of the Kermess held a year ago, $1,000 has been contributed by a friend, and the remaining $700, together with the cost of furnishing the house, is yet to be provided for. The Training School for nurses is in successful operation, having at present seven pupils, taking the two years' course.

IS IT A SUSTAINER?

How much manual labor do you think you do in a day? A post-man averages about 353 footfalls. An ordinary laborer 350 tons. A very hard day's work would be 400 tons. A clerk or bookkeeper may fall as low as from 15 to 20 tons. In Weston's recent walk to Albany, 150 miles, in 60 hours, we calculate his work was no less than 1005 footfalls, and his food consisted entirely of

H-O

Oatmeal. As an ideal sustainer, H-O meets every demand.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE

A Red-Letter Year for 1897.

THE ENTIRE NOVELTY of many of the plans for two is noticeable. For instance, the series devoted to

"LONDON AS SEEN BY CHARLES DANA GIBSON." Mr. Gibson has not been appeared as a writer. He visited London last summer for SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE, for the purpose of depicting with pen and pencil those scenes and types which the brave metropolis presents in endless variety.

Of like novelty is the first considerable

NOVEL BY RICHARD HARDING DAVIS, "Soldiers of Fortune." The hero is one of the most vigorous men that Mr. Davis has drawn. Illustrated by C. D. Gibson.

"THE CONDUCT OF GREAT BUSINESSES." A beautifully illustrated series of articles of which the following are already completed: "The Great Department Store." "The Management of a Great Hotel." "The Working of the Bank." "A Great Manufactory."

"UNDERGRADUATE LIFE IN AMERICAN COLLEGES." A series of articles touching upon the life of our older universities as represented by the doings of the students themselves.

Judge HENRY E. Howland writes on "Undergraduate Life at Yale."

W. James Alexander on "Princeton," and Robert Grant and Edward S. Martin on "Harvard."

"JAPAN AND CHINA SINCE THE WAR" will be a most interesting group of articles richly illustrated.

"THE UNQUIET SEX." Under the title of "The Unquiet Sex," Mrs. Helen Watterson Moody will write a series of articles on Woman and Reforms. The College-Bred Girl, the Woman's Club, and "The Coming of Maria" (a paper on domestic service).

W. D. HOWELLS'S "Story of a Play" In this Mr. Howells will tell the story of what he has ever produced in his delightful vein of light comedy.

GEORGE W. CABLE. In addition to the fiction enumerated there will be a series of four short stories by George W. Cable, the only one he has written for many years.

HOW TO TRAVEL WISELY with a minimum of wear and tear must be regarded as an art. Mr. Underwood and Mr. LEWIS MORRIS IDDINGS will, in two articles, offer a variety of useful suggestions and hints. HOW TO AND HOW NOT TO TRAVEL. This will be happily rounded out by an article from RICHARD HARDING DAVIS on "TRAVELERS ONE MEETS: Their Ways and Methods." Many illustrations by American and foreign artists will be highly pertinent.

 It is impossible in a small space to even mention the many attractive features for 1897. A beautiful illustrated booklet has been prepared, which will be sent, postage paid, on request.

BE SIMPLE AND HAPPY.

DR. J. F. RIGG'S WORDS OF ADMONITION INSPIRED BY SCRIPTURE.

Be that is faithful in Small Things Will Cultivate the Mind to Greater Things—Freedom Things Come in Common Place.

In the absence of the pastor, Rev. Cornelius Schenck, Ph. D., the Rev. Dr. J. F. Riggs, of New Brunswick, preached both morning and evening in Trinity Reformed church, Sunday, and at each service there was a good attendance. In the evening he read the scriptures from First Kings, 19th chapter, and also from Ecclesiastes, 3d chapter. His text was from First Kings, 20th chapter, 1st verse:—"As thy servant was busy here and there, he was gone."

"The tragedy of life," said the doctor, "is not so much what they do, but what they have done, certain conditions in life call for activity and there are tides in men's lives which lead to fame and fortune. But God changes the positions in life. Thousands ignore God's gifts to attain lesser things. Temporal and spiritual opportunities come not infrequently and the greatest opportunity in one's life comes at intervals. Great opportunities oftentimes comes to the unbeliever and he that is faithful in small things will cultivate the mind to greater things. Precious things come to use in the disguise of the common place. The shell of life is the common place. The man whose intellect is clear, who has noble views and can speak the truth in spite of all hostilities, may not readily see the results, but God alone opens the door before us to eternal life, which no one can shut."

Resuming his discourse, the Doctor said in part: "We must be trained under proper conditions. The man who is noble, pure and brave in his everyday life is one of God's chosen people. Learn to be patient in the drudgery of common things, is the one great lesson in spiritual life. Make a wise choice in everything. Jesus Christ saved others yet Himself He could not save. Had He come down from the cross He could not have saved Himself and the world, too. The education God gives us is to give sooner than receive; individually we are absolutely nothing, but collectively we are drawn into His plan. Worldly things are pleasing to the mind, but this God disclaims. Make the humble happy in that which is spiritual. The Poet Whittier recognized the moral munificence of giving rather than receiving.

"Nothing can resist the forces which are perpetual. The time will come when the ordinary forces of nature will collapse. Three great men—Henry Clay, Daniel Webster and Horace Greeley, lay dead of broken hearts, because they longed to be President. We go to God in prayer, ask and receive favors and privileges which are soon lost, yet God comes into our souls and dwells where failure is made impossible.

"Despise secondary matters," said the Reverend Doctor in conclusion, "for he who is born once dies twice; but he who is born twice never dies."

END OF AN ACTIVE LIFE.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE ROSWELL G. HORR HELD SUNDAY.

Dr. Collier Conducted a Simple, But Impressive Ceremony—Likening Him to a Patriot Who Died For His Country.

The funeral obsequies of the late ex-Congressman Roswell G. Horr were held at his late residence, 808 Park avenue, Sunday afternoon, at 5:30 o'clock. Rev. Dr. Robert Collier, of the Church of the Messiah, New York, and old friend of Mr. Horr, officiated at the ceremony. A tenor solo, "My Ain Countree," by Elmer E. Runyon, opened the service, and then Dr. Collier read a portion of the Episcopal service and that beautiful poem, "The Sunset Poem," by Edwin Arnold. He then spoke a few words about his late friend as follows:

"It is fitting," he said, "that we should gather with the sorrowing family about the dust of the good man and think how good and blessed it is that we can have such men among us and to help us. I saw in the papers that he came home to die from the long struggle of the summer in which he took such an important part. I do not say too much if I say that our dear friend gave his life for his country as surely as a soldier who falls in battle. It was a crisis of which I will not speak. He came to the rescue with all his power, and after the tremendous work he then performed he rests today.

"I rest my wreath on his coffin for all the work he did for his country. Was not this last act a piece with the rest of his life? In his earlier years he was always striving to fulfill his duty to his country and his family. Through all his years has he not striven to acquit himself as an upright man, a good man, and a true man?

"I do not feel called to ask how he stood in matters of church doctrine, he may have differed from mine. He loved the truth and he loved the right and he was a sweet, tender and good father, friend and patriot man. He could not have been so if he had not trusted in God.

"It is a great thing to have such men among us. He was one of the kind of men that we call the square men. Of his public life you know as much of it as I do, and of his private life, those who have lived with him and loved him, know best. He has lived respected and loved. Multitudes have heard him gladly on mighty questions of the country. I consider such a man as useful and essential as any minister.

"Shall we say goodbye to the dust and say the story is ended? Never. Always from the grave we look up to the immortal life above."

Then Dr. Collier gave his thought of the eternal life above and how it had comforted him when his loved ones had passed away and spoke lovingly words of comfort to the bereaved ones, and ended with an earnest and heartfelt prayer. He next read the rest of the funeral service and then the friends passed into the next room to take a parting look at their kind friend and neighbor.

The floral tributes, which surrounded the casket, were simple but beautiful, while two large palm branches, tied with purple ribbon, were grossed above the casket.

Henry Hall, publisher of the New York Tribune, and Nathaniel Tuttle, cashier of the Tribune, and his son, Horton Tuttle, all of New York, were present. There was also Mayor Alex. Gilbert, Mayor-elect Charles J. Fisk and a number of other friends from this city. The remains were taken to Wellington, Ohio, today for interment.

MARRIED ALMOST A YEAR.

But the Announcement of the Nuptial Event Just Made.

The announcement of the marriage of Miss Maude Cole and George Wilson, both of the borough, has just been made. The marriage took place last March and has been kept a secret until a few days ago, when the groom made known the fact to his mother.

A Daily Press representative called at the home of the groom's mother Tuesday morning, where Mr. and Mrs. Wilson are living, but was unable to learn any further particulars regarding the affair, except a confirmation of the fact that her son was married.

A THROAT HE WOULD CUT

MAT. WALLACE DOESN'T WANT TO BE HOUNDED BY AN OLD LOVE.

He is Married to Another Now and Don't Propose to Have Scandalous Stories Circulated—Complaint in Court Not Pushed

They met under the Park avenue railroad bridge one evening last week and he said things to her which she thinks he should not have said. They were not in love with each other exactly, they had quarreled sometime ago, and their relations were a trifle strained.

Matthew Wallace lives on Sycamore street, and he has only been recently married. He is attentive to his wife as he ought to be. Wallace is a colored man employed in a local plumbing shop, and has the reputation of being a steady man. There is a colored woman in this city, now housekeeper for Mail Carrier James Frisbie, with whom Wallace has not been on good terms for some time. They have quarreled and there has been trouble before. They met as above stated, and she claims that he used insulting language and threatened to cut her throat.

Such language was not to be thought of and she put the matter in the hands of the police. She appeared before the City Judge and the complaint duly made and sworn to. Then the alleged offender was ordered to appear before the Judge Monday evening.

Wallace appeared before the Judge Monday, according to orders, but the complainant didn't come. They waited a little while for her, but the courts are not called at the convenience of the parties but when they can be held. Wallace told his story. The complainant in the case, he said, had been making all sorts of scandalous remarks about him and his conduct since his marriage and he had met her on the street and told her that if she didn't stop that he would cut her throat, making the latter remark more impressive by the addition of a well-known adjective.

As the complainant failed to appear and push the case, the Judge dismissed the complaint.

TOM KELLER MAKES A CHANGE.

He Will Now Represent the Peters Cartridge Company.

About the most popular traveling representative that visits the trade engaged in the sale of ammunition is Thomas Keller, of this city. "Tee Kay," as he is familiarly known among the shooting men. Has been engaged as a representative of the United States Cartridge Co., of Lowell, Mass., for several years. Mr. Keller has severed his connections with that company and has now become associated with the Peters Cartridge Co., and Kings Powder Co., of Cincinnati, O., a firm well known to the trade throughout the land. We congratulate the Peters Cartridge Company in securing the services of such a hustling salesman as Tom Keller, and also congratulate Mr. Keller in connecting himself with such a progressive firm as the Peters Cartridge Company.

Tom Keller is known among sportsmen from Maine to California, and is a popular fellow with the trade as well as with the shooting men. He is one of those fat, jolly fellows who always have a good story, a joke or a bit of humor ready to keep all in a happy mood when a gathering of trap shooters is held.

As a trap shot he stands well in the front rank, and last spring he made a record on live birds in California that placed him in the front rank in that State as a live-bird shot. His record at inanimate targets is a good one, and he often lands among the winners in the big tournaments. He has an easy, natural way of shooting, which really does not give him the appearance of trying to break them all. A few misses never ruffle his temper, and his good-nature beams under defeat, as though it was a victory.

The Peters Cartridge Co. will have a representative that will boom their product, and the trap shooters and sportsmen will be glad to see Tom Keller in a new harness, where he can pull with all his might.

MADE THE TROLLEY GO SLOW.

Conductor Tried to Load the Horse off the Track and a Fight Ensued.

Paul Hemnelo, a milkman from Piscataway township, appeared before City Judge DeMeza Monday and wished to swear out a warrant for the arrest of Timothy McCarthy, conductor on the street railway, but he finally decided that he wouldn't. Hemnelo was driving down Putnam avenue when he stopped on the car track for a few moments. A trolley car came up behind but the milkman says he did not hear it. Finally the conductor, McCarthy, attempted to lead the horse off the track. Words ensued and at last they came to blows Both suffered from the encounter but the conductor's blows were the most effective.

THE MISTRESS of the Mine.

or A Woman's Revenge. Interwoven.

By Robert Barr.

[Copyright, 1895, by Robert Barr.]

"I would let them see me if they wanted to," murmured about the mine."

"Don't you think it will have any effect?"

"Not the slightest."

"But look at this letter from your own lawyers on the subject." Wentworth handed Longworth the letter from Hawk. Longworth adjusted his glass and read it carefully through.

"By Jove!" he said, with a laugh. "I call that distinctly good. I had no idea old Hawk was such a humorist! His reputation, indeed! well, that beats me! I see that Hawk wants is another suit on his hands. I wish you would let me keep this letter. I will have some fun with my friend Hawk over it."

"You are welcome to the letter, so far as I am concerned," said Wentworth; "but do you mean to say, Mr. Longworth, that we have to sit here calmly under this imputation and do nothing?"

"I mean to say nothing of the kind; but I don't propose to play into their hands by suing them; at least, I should not if it were my case instead of Kenyon's."

"What would you do?"

"I would let them sue me if they wanted to do so. Of course, their canvasser called to see you, didn't he, Kenyon?".

"Yes, he did."

"He told you that he had a certain amount of space to sell for a certain sum in cash?"

"Yes."

"And, if you did not buy that space, this certain article would appear, whereas, if you did, an article of quite a different complexion would be printed?"

"You seem to know all about it," said Kenyon, suspiciously.

"Of course, I do, my dear boy. Everybody knows all about it. That's the way those papers make their money. I think, myself, as a general rule, it is cheaper to buy them off. I believe my uncle always does that when he has anything special on hand and doesn't want to be bothered with outside issues. But we haven't done so in this instance, and this is the result. It can be easily remedied yet, mind you, if you like. All that you have to do is to pay his price, and there will be an equally lengthy article saying that, from outside information received with regard to the Canadian Mining company, he regrets very much that the former article was an entire mistake, and that there is no more secure investment in England than this particular mine. But now, when he has come out with his editorial, I think it isn't worth while to have any further dealings with him. Anything he can say now will not matter. He has done all the harm he can. But I would at once put the boot on the other foot. I would write down all the circumstances just as they happened—give the name of the young man who called upon you, tell exactly the price he demanded for his silence, and I will have that printed in an opposition paper to-morrow. Then it will be our friend, the Financial Field's, turn to squirm! He will say it is all a lie, of course, but nobody will believe him, and we can tell him, from the opposition paper, that if it is a lie he is perfectly at liberty to sue us for libel. Let him begin the suit if he wants to do so. Let him defend his reputation; time for him for that: I have a game worth two of that. Could you get out the statement before the meeting to-night?"

Kenyon, who had been looking for the first time in his life gratefully at Longworth, said he could.

"Very well: just set it down in your own words as plainly as possible, and give date, hour and full particulars. Sign your name to it, and I will take it when I come to the meeting this afternoon. It would not be a bad plan to read it to those who are here. There is nothing like fighting the devil with fire. Fight a paper with another paper! Nothing new, I suppose?"

"No," said Kenyon; "nothing new except what we are discussing."

"Well, don't let that trouble you. Do as I say, and we will begin an interesting controversy. People like a fight, and it will attract attention to the mine. Good-by. I shall see you this afternoon." And with that he was gone, leaving both Kenyon and Wentworth in a much happier frame of mind than that in which he had found them.

"I say, Kenyon," said Wentworth, "that fellow is a trump. His advice has cleared the air wonderfully. I believe his plan is the best, after all, and, as you say, we have no money for an expensive lawsuit. I will leave you now to get on with your work, and will be back at three o'clock."

At that hour John had his statement concluded. The first man in was Longworth, who read it with approval, merely suggesting a few verbal changes here and there, which was duly made. Then he put the communication into an envelope and sent it to the editor of the opposition paper. Wentworth came in next, then Melville, then Mr. King. After this they all adjourned to the directors' room, and in a few minutes the others were present.

"Now," said Longworth, "as we are all here, I do not see any necessity for delay. You have probably read the article that appeared in this morning's Financial Field. Mr. Kenyon has written a statement in relation to that which gives the full particulars of the inside of a very disreputable piece of business. It was merely an attempt at blackmailing which failed. I intended to have had the statement read to you, but we thought it best to get it off as quickly as possible, and it will appear to-morrow in the financial organ where, I hope, you will read it. Now, Mr. Kenyon, maybe you will tell us what has been done since we left you this morning."

Kenyon, like many men of worth and not of words, was a very poor speaker. He seemed confused, and was often a lit the obscure in his remarks, but he was listened to with great attention by those present. He was helped here and there by a judicious question from young Longworth, and when he sat down the impression was not so bad as might have been expected. After a moment's silence it was Mr. King who spoke.

"As I take it," he said, "all we wish to know is this: Is the mine what it is represented to be? Is the mineral the best for the use Mr. Kenyon has indicated? Is there a sufficient quantity of that mineral in the mountain he speaks of to make it worth while to organize this company? It seems to me that this can only be answered by some practical man going out there and seeing the mine for himself. Mr. Melville is, I understand, a practical man. If he has the time to spare, I would propose that he should go to America, see this mine and report."

Another person asked when the option on the mine ran out. This was answered by young Longworth, who said that the person who went over and reported on the mine could cable the word "right" or "wrong;" then there would be time to act in London in getting up the list of subscribers.

"I suppose," said another, "that in case of delay there would be no trouble in renewing the option for a month or two?"

"Yes."

"Are you going?"

"I do not know. I should like to go, and yet, you know, I am entirely unused to fashionable assemblages. I should not know what to say or do while I was there."

"As I understand, it is not to be a fashionable affair, but merely a little friendly gathering which Miss Longworth gives because her cousin is about to be married. I don't want to flatter you, John, but I imagine Miss Longworth would be rather disappointed if you did not put in appearance. Besides, as we are partners with Longworth in this, and as he is going away on account of the mine, I think it would be little for the interests of us not to go."

"Very well; I will go. Shall I call for you, or will you come for me?"

"I will call for you, and we will go there together in a cab. Be ready about eight o'clock."

The mansion of the Longworths was brilliantly lighted that night, and John felt rather faint-hearted as he stood on the steps before going in. The chances are he would not have had the courage to go unannounced if his friend Wentworth had not been with him. George, however, had no such qualms, and was much more used to this kind of thing than his comrade. So they went in together and were warmly welcomed by the hostess.

"It is so kind of you to come," she said, "on such short notice. I was afraid you might have had some prior engagement and would have found it impossible to get here at all."

"You did not think that of me," said Wentworth. "I was certain to come; but I must confess my friend Kenyon here was rather difficult to manage. He seems to frown on fashionable assemblages, and actually had the cruelty to suggest that I should both have prior engagements."

Edith looked reproachfully at Kenyon, who flushed to the temples, as was usual with him, and said:

"Mr. Wentworth, this is unfair. You must not mind what he says, Miss Longworth; he likes to bring confusion on me, and he knows how to do it. I certainly said nothing about a prior engagement."

"Well, now you are here, I hope you will enjoy yourselves. It is quite an informal little gathering, with nothing to abash even Mr. Kenyon."

They found young Longworth there in company with Melville, who was to be his companion on the voyage. He shook hands, but without exhibiting the pleasure at meeting them which his cousin had shown.

"My cousin," said the young man, "seems anxious to make the going of the prodigal nephew an occasion for killing the fatted calf. I'm sure I don't know why, unless that she is glad to be rid of me for a month."

The young lady blushed and left the men together. Wentworth soon contrived to make himself very agreeable to the young ladies who were present: but John, it must be admitted, felt awkward and out of place. He was not enjoying himself. He caught himself now and then following Edith Longworth with his eyes; and when he realized he was doing this he abruptly looked at the floor. In her handsome evening dress she appeared supremely lovely, and this John Kenyon admitted to himself with a sigh, for her very loveliness seemed to place her further and further away from him. Somebody played something on the piano, and this was, in a way, a respite for John. He felt that nobody was looking at him. Then a young man gave a recitation which was very well received, and began to forget his uneasiness. A German gentleman with long hair sat down at the piano with a good deal of importance in his demeanor. There was much arranging of music, and, finally, when the leaves were settled to his satisfaction, there was a tremendous crash of chords, the beginning of what was evidently going to be a troublesome time for the piano. In the midst of this hurricane of sound John Kenyon became aware that Edith Longworth had sat down beside him.

"I have got every one comfortably settled with every one else," she said in a whisper to him, "and you seem to be the only one who is, as it were, out in the cold, so you see I have done you a favor to come and talk to you."

"It is indeed an honor," said John, earnestly.

"Oh, really," said the young woman, laughing very softly, "you must not take things so seriously. I didn't mean anything by that. You know that was only as the children say, 'pretended,' but you take one's light remarks as if they were most weighty sentences. Now, you must look as if you were entertaining me charmingly, whereas I have sat down beside you to have a very few minutes' talk on business. I know it's very bad form to talk business at an evening party, but you see I have no other chance to speak to you. I understand you have had several meetings of shareholders, and yet you never sent me an invitation, although I told you that I wished to help you in forming a company, but that is the way you business men always treat a woman."

"Really, Miss Longworth," began Kenyon, but she speedily interrupted him.

"I am not going to let you make any explanation. I have come over here to enjoy myself, and I am not to be cheated out of my pleasure."

"I think," said John, "if you knew how much I have suffered during this last day or two, you would be very lenient with me. Did you read that article anyone in the Financial Field?"

"No; I did not, but I read your reply to it this morning, and I think it was excellent."

"Ah, that was hardly fair. A person should read both sides of the question before passing judgment."

"It is a woman's idea of fairness," said Edith, "to read what pertains to her friend, and to form her judgment without hearing the other side. But you must not think I am going to forego scolding you because of my sympathy for you. Don't you remember your promises to let me know how your company was getting on from time to time, and here I have never heard a word from you; now tell me how you have been getting on."

"Why do you not go to America?"

"I hardly know, but I think we are getting on very well, indeed. You know, of course, that your cousin is going to America to report upon the mine. As I have stated nothing but what is perfectly true about the property, there can be no question as to what that report will be, so it seems to me everything is going on nicely."

"Why do you not go to America?"

"Ah! well, I am an interested party, and those who are thinking of going with us have my report already. It is necessary to corroborate that. When we are organized I expect my services have no trouble in forming a company."

"And was William chosen by those men to go to Canada?"

"He was not exactly chosen; he volunteered. Mr. Melville, here, was the one who was chosen."

"And why Mr. Melville, more than you, for instance?"

"Well, as I said, I am out of the question being an interested party. Melville is a man connected with china works, and, as such, in a measure, an expert."

"Is Mr. Melville a friend of yours?"

"No, he is not. I never saw him until he came to the meeting."

"Do you know," she said, lowering her voice and bending toward him, "that I do not like Mr. Melville's face?"

Kenyon glanced at Melville, who was at the other side of the room, and Edith went on: "You must not look at people when I mention them in that way, or they will know we are talking about them. I do not like his face. He is too handsome a man, and I don't like handsome men."

"Don't you, really?" said John. "Then you ought to—" Edith laughed softly, a low, musical laugh that was not heard above the piano din, and was meant for John alone, and to his ears it was the sweetest music he had ever heard.

"I know what you were going to say," she said; "you were going to say that in this case I ought to like you. Well, I do; that is why I am taking such an interest in your mine, and in your friend, Mr. Wentworth. And so my cousin volunteered to go to Canada? Now, I think you ought to go yourself."

"Why?" said Kenyon, startled that she should have touched the point that had been discussed between Wentworth and himself.

"I can only give you a woman's reason, because I do." It seems to me you ought to be there to know what they report at the time they do report. Perhaps they won't understand the mine without your explanation, and then, you see, an adverse report might come back in perfect good faith. I think you ought to go to America, Mr. Kenyon."

"That is just what George Wentworth says."

"Does he? I always thought he was a very sensible young man, and now I am sure of it. Well, I must not stay here gossiping with you on business. I see the professor is going to finish, and so I shall have to look after my other guests. If I don't see you again this evening, or have another opportunity of speaking with you, think over what I have said." And then, with the most charming hypocrisy, the young woman thanked the professor for the music to which she had not listened in the least.

"Well, how did you enjoy yourself?" said Wentworth, when they had got outside again. It was a clear, star light night, and they had resolved to walk home together.

"I enjoyed myself very well, indeed," answered Kenyon; "much better than I expected. It was a little awkward at first, but I got over that."

"I noticed you did—with help."

"Yes, 'with help.'"

"If you are inclined to rave, John, now that we are under the stars, remember I am a close confidant and a sympathetic listener. I should like to know how you have learn how an exasperatingly sensible man acts under the mania."

"I shall not rave about anything, George, but I will tell you something. I am going to Canada."

"Ah! did she speak about that?"

"She did."

"And, of course, her advice at once decides the matter, after my most cogent arguments have failed."

"Don't be offended, George, but—it does."

CHAPTER XIX.

"What name, please?"

"Tell Mr. Wentworth a lady wishes to see him."

The boy departed rather dubiously, for he knew that his message was decidedly irregular in a business office. People should give their names.

"A lady to see you, sir," he said to Wentworth, and then, just as the boy had expected, his employer wanted to know the lady's name. Ladies are not frequent visitors at the offices of an accountant in the city, so Wentworth touched his collar and tie to make sure they were in their correct position, and, nodding to the lady was, asked the boy to show her in.

"How do you do, Mr. Wentworth?" she said, brightly, advancing toward his table and holding out her hand. Wentworth caught his breath, took her extended hand somewhat limply, then he pulled himself together and said:

"This is an unexpected pleasure, Miss Brewster."

Jennie blushed very prettily and laughed a laugh that Wentworth thought was like a little ripple of music from a mellow flute.

"It may be unexpected," she said, "but you don't look a bit like a man suffering from an overdose of pure joy. You didn't expect to see me, did you?"

"I did not, but, now that you are here, may I ask in what way I can serve you?"

"Well, in the first place you may ask me to take a chair, and in the second place you may sit down yourself, for I have come to have a long talk with you."

The prospect did not seem to be so alluring to Wentworth as one might have expected when the announcement was made by a girl so pretty and dressed in such exquisite taste, but the young man promptly offered her a chair, and then sat down with the table between them. She placed her parasol and her trinkets she had been carrying on the table, arranging them with some care; then, having given him time to recover from his surprise, she flashed a look at him and sent a thrill to the anger tips of the young man. Yet a danger understood is a danger half overcome; and Wentworth, unconsciously to being a deep breath, nerved himself against any recurrence of a feeling he had been trying to forget, with but indifferent success, saying grimly, but only half convincingly, to himself: "You are not going to fool me a second time, my girl, lovely as you are."

A glimmer of a smile hovered about the red lips of a girl, a smile hardly perceptible, but giving an effect to her clear complexion, as if a sunbeam had crept into the room and its reflection had lit up her face.

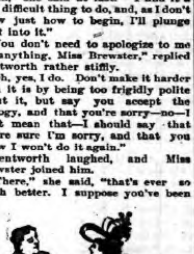
"I have come to apologize, Mr. Wentworth," she said at last. "I find it a very difficult thing to do, and, as I don't know how to begin, I'll plunge right into it."

"You don't need to apologize to me for anything, Miss Brewster," replied Wentworth rather stiffly.

"Oh, yes, I do. Don't make it harder than it is by being too frigidly polite about it, but say you accept the apology, and that you're sorry—no—I don't mean that—I should say that you're sure I'm sorry, and that you know I won't do it again."

Wentworth laughed, and Miss Brewster joined him.

"There," she said, "that's ever so much better. I suppose you've been



"I want you to tell me something about your father."

thinking hard things of me ever since we last met."

"I've tried to," replied Wentworth. "Now that's what I call honest; besides I like the implied compliment. I think it's very neat, indeed."

"I am very sorry that I—that things happened as they did. I wouldn't have blamed you if you had used exceedingly strong language about it at the time."

"I must confess that I did."

"Ah," said Jennie, with a sigh, "you men have so many comforts denied us women. But I came here for another purpose: I had merely wanted to apologize I think I would have written. I want some information which you can give me, if you like."

The young woman rested her elbow on the table, with her chin in her hands, gazing across at him seriously and innocently. Poor George felt that it would be impossible to refuse anything of those large beseeching eyes.

"I want you to tell me about your mine."

All the geniality that had gradually come into Wentworth's face and manner vanished instantly.

"So this is the old business over again," he said.

"How can you say that!" cried Jennie, reproachfully. "I am asking for my own satisfaction entirely, and not for my paper. Besides, I tell you frankly what I want to know, and don't try to get it by indirect means—by false pretenses—as you once said."

"How can you expect me to give you information that does not belong to me alone? I have no right to speak of a business which concerns others without their permission."

"Ah, then there are at least two others concerned in the mine," said Jennie, gleefully. "Kenyon is one, I know, who is the other?"

"Miss Brewster, I will tell you nothing."

"But you have told me something already. Please go on and talk, Mr. Wentworth—about anything you like—and I shall soon find out all I want to know about the mine."

She paused, and Wentworth remained silent, which, indeed, the bewildered young man realized was the only safe thing to do.

"They speak of the talkativeness of women," Miss Brewster went on, as if soliloquizing, "but it is nothing to that of the men. Once get a man talking, and you learn everything he knows—besides ever so much more that he doesn't."

Miss Brewster had abandoned her very pretty attitude, and, with the suggestion of confidential relations, had removed her elbows from the table, sitting now back in her chair gazing dreamily at the dingy window which let the light in from the dingy court. She seemed to have forgotten that Wentworth was there, and addressed no herself than to him:

"I wonder if Kenyon would tell me about the mine."

"You might ask him."

"No, it wouldn't do any good," she continued, gently shaking her head. "He's one of your silent men, and there are so few of them in this world! Perhaps I had better go to William Wentworth himself: he is not suspicious of me."

And as she said this she threw a quick glance at Wentworth, and the unfortunate young man's face at once told that she had struck home. She bent her brow over the table and laughed with such evident enjoyment that Wentworth, in spite of his helpless anger, smiled grimly.

Jennie raised her head, but the sight of his perplexed countenance was too much for her, and it was some time before her merriment allowed her to speak. At last she said:

"Wouldn't you like to take me by the shoulders and put me out of the room, Mr. Wentworth?"

"I'd like to take you by the shoulders and shake you."

"Ah! that would be taking a liberty and could not be permitted. We must leave punishment to the law, you know, although I do think a man should be allowed to turn an objectionable visitor into the street."

"Miss Brewster," cried the young man, earnestly, leaning over the table toward her, "why don't you abandon your horrible inquisitorial profession and put your undoubted talents to some other use?"

"What, for instance?"

"Oh—anything."

Jennie rested her fair cheek against her open palm again and looked at the dingy window. There was a long silence between them. Wentworth was absorbed in watching her clear-cut profile and her white throat, his heart quickening as he feasted his eyes on her beauty.

"I have always got angry," she said, at last, in a low voice, with the quiver of a suppressed sigh in it, "when other people have said that to me—I wonder why it is I merely feel angry, and not when you say it? It is so easy to say, 'Oh—anything' so easy—so easy. You are a man, with the strength and determination of a man, yet you have met with disappointments and obstacles that have required all your courage to overcome. Every man has, and with every success it is a fight until the head is gray and the brain weary with the ceaseless struggle. The world is utterly merciless; it will trample you down relentlessly if it can, and if you vigilance relaxes for a moment it will steal your crust and leave you to starve. When I think of this incessant, unequal contest, with no quarter given or taken, I shudder and pray that I may die before I am at the mercy of the pitiless world. And when I came to London I was for the first time in my life that hopeless melancholy promenade of the sandwich men, human wreckage drifting along the edge of the street, as if they had been cast up there by the rushing tide sweeping past them. They—they seemed to me like a tottering procession of the dead—and on their backs was the announcement of a play that" was making all London ring with laughter—the awful comedy and tragedy of it! Well, I simply couldn't stand it! I had to run up a side street and cry like the little fool I was, right in broad daylight."

Jennie paused and tried to laugh, but the effort ended in a sound suspiciously like a sob, and she dashed her hand, with quick impatience, across her eyes, from which Wentworth had never taken his own, watching them dim as the light from the window proved too strong for them, and finally fill as she ceased to speak. Searching ineffectually about her dress for a handkerchief, which lay on the table beside her parasol, unnoticed by either, Jennie went on, with some difficulty:

"Well, these poor, forlorn creatures were once men—men who had gone down, and if the world is so hard on a man, with all his strength and resourcefulness, think—think what it is for a woman, to be thrown into this inhuman turmoil—a woman without friends — without money — flung among these relentless wolves—to live if she can—or—to die—if she can't."

The girl's voice broke and she buried her face in her arms, which rested on the table.

Wentworth sprang to his feet and came round to where she sat.

"Jennie," he said, putting his hand on her shoulder.

The girl, without looking up, shook off the hand that touched her.

"Go back to your place!" she cried, in a smothered voice. "Leave me alone!"

"Jennie," persisted Wentworth.

The young woman rose from her chair and faced him, stepping back a pace.

"Don't you hear what I say? Go back and sit down. I came here to talk business; not to make a fool of myself. It's all your fault, and I hate you for it—you and your silly questions."

But the young man stood where he was, in spite of the dangerous sparkle that lit up his visitor's wet eyes. A frown gathered on his brow.

"Jennie," he said, slowly, "are you playing with me again?"

The swift anger that blazed up in her face, reddening her cheeks, dried the tears.

"How dare you say such a thing to me!" she cried, hotly. "Do you flatter yourself that because I came here to talk business, I have also some personal interest in you? Surely even your self-conceit doesn't run so far as that!"

Wentworth stood silent, and Miss Brewster picked up her parasol, scattering, in her haste, the other articles on the floor. If she expected Wentworth to put them on the table again she was disappointed, for, although his eyes were upon her, his thoughts were far away upon the Atlantic ocean.

"Couldn't you have left them in peace?" she cried, resentfully, bringing Wentworth's thoughts back with a rush to London again. "It is intolerable that you should use such an expression to me. Playing with you, indeed!"

"I had no intention of insulting you, Miss Brewster."

"What is it but an insult to use such a phrase? It implies that I either like or—or love you."

"And do you?"

"Do I what?"

"Do you care for me?"

Jennie shook out the lace fringes of her parasol and smoothed them with some precision, as if her eyes were keen on what she was doing, and consequently they did not meet those of her questioner.

"I care for you as a friend, of course," she said, at last, still giving much attention to the parasol. "If I had not looked on you as a friend I would not have come here to consult with you, would I?"

"No, I suppose not. Well, I am sorry I used the words that displeased you, and now, if you will permit it, we will go on with the consultation."

"It wasn't a pretty thing to say."

"I'm afraid I'm not good at saying pretty things."

"You used to be." The parasol being arranged to her liking she glanced up at him. "Still you said you were sorry, and that's all a man can say—or a woman either, for that's what I said myself a moment ago. Now, if you will pick up those things from the floor—thanks—we will talk about the mine."

Wentworth seated himself in his chair again and said:

"Well, what is it you wish to know about the mine?"

"Nothing at all."

"But you said you wanted information."

"What a funny reason to give! And how a man misses all the fine points of a conversation! No; just because I asked for information, you might have known that it was what I really wanted."

"I'm afraid I'm very stupid. I hate to ask boldly what you did want, but I would like to know."

"I want a vote of confidence. I told you I was sorry because of a certain episode. I wanted to be sure of your friendship, and I found you didn't. There," "I think that was hardly a fair test. You see the facts did not belong to me also."

Miss Brewster sighed, and slowly shook her head.

"That wouldn't have made the least difference if you had really trusted me."

"Oh, I say! You couldn't expect a man to—"

"Yes, I could."

"What, merely a friend?"

Miss Brewster nodded.

"Well, all I can say," remarked Wentworth, with a laugh, "is that friendship has made greater strides in the states than it has in this country."

Before Jennie could reply the useful boy knocked at the door and brought in a tea tray, which he placed before his master; then silently departed, closing the door noiselessly.

"May I offer you a cup of tea?"

"Please. What a curious custom this drinking of tea is in business offices. I think I shall write an article on 'A Nation of Tea Tipplers.' If I were an enemy to England, instead of being its greatest friend, I would descend with my army on this country between the hours of four and five in the afternoon, and so take the population unawares while it was drinking tea. What would you do if the enemy came down on you during such a sacred national ceremony?"

"I would offer her a cup of tea," replied Wentworth, suiting the action to the phrase.

"Mr. Wentworth," said the girl, archly, "you're improving. That remark was distinctly good. Still, you must remember that I come as a friend, not as an enemy. Did you ever read the 'Babes in the Wood?' It is a most instructive but pathetic work of fiction. You remember the wicked uncle, surely. Well, you and Mr. Kenyon remind me of the babes, poor, innocent, little beings, and London—this part of it—is the dark and hideous forest. I am the bird hovering about you, waiting to cover you with leaves. The leaves, to do any good, ought to be checks fluttering down on you, but, alas! I haven't any. I've got the checks only green on trees, life would not be so difficult."

Miss Brewster sipped her tea pensively, and Wentworth listened to the musical murmur of her voice, which had such an entrancing effect on him, that he was more likely to notice what she said than a man should when a lady is speaking. The tea drinking had added a touch of domesticity to the tete-a-tete that rather went to the head of the young man. He clinched and unclinched his hand on the sight under the table and felt the moisture on his palm. He hoped he would be able to retain control over himself, but the difficulty of his task almost overcame him for the moment, and then appealed to him with glance or gesture, and he felt as if he must cry out: "My girl, my girl, don't do that, if you expect me to stay where I am."

"I see you are not paying the slightest attention to what I am saying," she said, pushing the cup from her. She rested her arms on the table, leaning slightly forward, and turning her face full upon him. "I can tell by your eyes that you are thinking of something else."

"I assure you," said George, drawing a deep breath, "I am listening with intense interest."

"Well, that's right, for what I am going to say is important. Now, to make quite sure, I will first tell you all about your mine, so that you will understand I did not need to ask anyone for information regarding it."

Here, to Wentworth's astonishment, she gave a rapid and accurate sketch of the negotiations and arrangements between the three partners and the present position of affairs.

"How do you know all this?" he asked.

"Never mind that, and you mustn't ask me. I know what I am now going to tell you, but you must believe it implicitly and act upon it promptly. Longworth is fooling both you and Kenyon. He is making time, so that your options will run out; then he will pay cash for the mine at the original price, and you and Kenyon will be left to pay two-thirds of the debt incurred. Where is Kenyon?"

"He has gone to America."

"That's good. I want him to get the option renewed. You can then try to form the company yourselves in London. If he can't obtain a renewal, you have very little time to get the cash together, and if you are not able to do that then you lose everything. This is what I came to tell you, although I have been a long time about it. Now I must go."

She rose, gathered her belongings from the table, and stood with the parasol pressed against her. Wentworth came around to where she was standing, his face paler than usual, probably because of the news he had heard. One hand was grasped tightly around one wrist behind him. He felt that he should thank her for what she had done, but his lips were dry and somehow the proper words were not at his command.

She, holding her fragile lace-fringed parasol against her with one arm, was adjusting her long neatly-fitting glove, which she had removed before tea. A button, one of many, was difficult to fasten, and as she endeavored to put it into this place and that fell away, showing a round white arm above the glove.

"You see," she said, a little breathlessly, her eyes upon her glove, "it is a very serious situation, and time is of great importance."

"I realize that."

"It would be such a pity to lose everything now, when you have had so much trouble and worry."

"It would."

"And I think that whatever is done should be done quickly. You should act at once and with energy."

"I am convinced that is so."

"Of course it is. You are of too trusting a nature; you should be more suspicious, then you wouldn't be tricked as you have been."

"No. The trouble is I have been too suspicious, but that is past. I won't be again."

"What are you talking about?" she said, looking quickly up at him. "Don't you know you'll lose the mine if—"

"Hang the mine!" he cried, flinging his wrist free and clasping her elbow before she could step back or move from her place. "There is something more important than mines or money."

The parasol broke with a sharp snap, and the girl murmured: "Oh, ' but the murmur was faint.

"Never mind the parasol," he said, pulling it from between them and tossing it aside. "I'll get you another."

"Reckless man!" she gasped. "You little know how much it cost. And I think, you know, I ought to have been consulted—in an—in an affair of this kind—George."

"And I'll be Lady Wentworth yet."

"There was no time. I acted upon your own advice—promptly. You are not angry, Jennie, my dear girl, are you?"

"I suppose I'm not, though I think I ought to be, especially as I know only too well that I held my heart in my hand the whole time, almost offering it to you. I hope you won't treat it as you have treated the sunshade."

"Will you have it—for—mine?"

"You see," she said, putting his necktie straight, "I liked you from the very first, far more than I knew at the time. If you—I'm not trying to justify myself, you know—but if you had—well—just coaxed me a little yourself, I would never have sent that cable message. You seemed to give up everything, and you sent Kenyon to me, and that made me angry. I expected you to come back to me, but you never came."

"I was a stupid fool. I always am when I get a fair chance."

"Oh, no, you're not, but you do need some one to take care of you."

She suddenly held him at arm's length from her.

"You don't imagine for a moment, George Wentworth, that I came here today for—for this?"

"Certainly not," cried the honest young man with much indignant fervor, drawing her again toward him.

"Then it's all right. I couldn't bear to have you think such a thing, especially—well, I'll tell you why, some day. But I do wish you had a title. Do they ever ennoble accountants in this country, George?"

"No, they knight only rich fools."

"Oh, I'm so glad of that, for you'll get rich on the mine, and I'll be Lady Wentworth yet."

She drew his head down until her laughing lips touched his.

CHAPTER XX.

Although the steamship that took Kenyon to America was one of the speediest in the Atlantic service, yet the voyage was inexpressively dreary to him. He spent most of his time walking up and down deck thinking about the other voyage of a few months before. The one consolation of his present trip was its quickness.

When he arrived at his hotel in New York, he asked if there was any message for him, and the clerk handed him an envelope, which he tore open. It was a cable dispatch from Wentworth, with the words: "Longworth at Windsor. Proceed to Ottawa immediately. Get option renewed. Longworth's movements."

John knitted his brows and wondered where Windsor was. The clerk, seeing his perplexity, asked if he could be of any assistance.

"I have received this cablegram, but don't quite understand it. Where is Windsor?"

"Oh, that means the Windsor hotel. Just up the street."

Kenyon registered, and told the clerk to assign him a room and send his bag page up to it when it came. Then he walked to the colossal hostelry, and was just inquiring of the clerk whether a Mr. Longworth was staying there when the gentleman appeared at the desk and took some letters and his key.

Kenyon tapped him on the shoulder.

Young Longworth turned round with more alacrity than he usually displayed, and gave a long whistle of surprise when he saw whom it was.

"In the name of all the gods," he cried, "what are you doing here?" Then, before Kenyon could reply, he said: "Come up to my room."

They went to the elevator, rose a few stories, and passed down an apparently endless hall, carpeted with some noiseless stuff that gave no echo of the footfall. Longworth put his key into the door and opened it. They entered a big and pleasant room.

"Well," he said, "this is a surprise. What is the reason of your being here? Anything wrong in London?"

"Nothing wrong so far as I am aware. We received no cablegrams from you, and thought there might be some hitch in the business; therefore I came."

"Ah, I see. I cabled over to your address and said I was staying at the Windsor for a few days. I sent a cablegram also as long as a letter, but it didn't appear to do any good."

"No; I did not receive it."

"And what did you expect was wrong over here?"

"That I did not know. I knew you had time to get to Ottawa and see the mine in twelve days from London. Not hearing from you in that time, and knowing the option was running out, both Wentworth and I became anxious, and so I came over."

"Well, I'm afraid you've had your trip for nothing."

"What do you mean? Is not the mine all I said it was?"

"Oh! the mine is all right; all I meant was, there was really no necessity of your coming."

"But, you know, the option ends in a very short time."

"Well, the option, like the mine, is all right. I thing you might quite safely have left it in my hands."

It must be admitted that John Kenyon began to feel he had acted with unreasonable rashness in taking his long trip.

"Is Mr. Melville here with you?"

"Mr. Melville has returned home. He had not time to stay longer. All he wanted to see was the mine, to satisfy himself about the mine. He was satisfied, and he has gone home. If you were in London now you would be able to see him."

"Did you meet Mr. Von Brent?"

"Yes; he took us to the mine."

"And did you say anything about the option to him?"

"Well, we had some conversation about it. There will be no trouble about the option. What Von Brent wants is to sell the mine, that is all."

"There was a few moments' silence, then Longworth said: "When are you going back?"

"I don't know. I think I ought to see Von Brent. I am not at all easy about leaving matters as they are. I think I ought to get a renewal of the option. It is not wise to risk things as we are doing. Von Brent might at any time get an offer for his mine, just as we are forming our company, and, of course, if the option had not been renewed, he would sell to the first man who put down the money. As you say, all he wants is to sell the mine."

Longworth was busy opening his letters, and was paying very little attention to what Kenyon said. At last, however, he spoke:

"If I were you, if you care to take my advice, I would go straight back to England. You will do no good here. I never say all that we have done any further trouble, time and expense."

"Don't you think it would be as well to get a renewal of the option?"

"Oh! certainly; but, as I told you before, it was not at all necessary for you to come over. I may say, further-more, that Von Brent will not again renew the option without a handsome sum down, to be forfeited if the company is not formed. Have you the money for him?"

"No, I have not."

"Very well, then, there will not be the slightest use in your seeing Von Brent."

Young Mr. Longworth raised his eyebrows and glanced at John through his eyeglass. "I will let you have my third of the money if that will do any good."

"How much money does Von Brent want?"

"How should I know? To tell you the truth, Mr. Kenyon, and truth never hurts, or oughtn't to, I don't at all like this visit of yours to America. You and Mr. Wentworth have been good enough to be suspicious about me from the very first. You have not taken any pains to conceal it, either of you. Your appearance in America at this particular juncture is nothing more nor less than an insult to me. I intend to resent it in some way."

"I have no intention of insulting you," said Kenyon, "if you are dealing fairly with me."

"There it is again. That remark is an insult. I wish to have nothing more to say to you. I give you my advice that you go back to London, and absolve me from all further trouble and expense."

Kenyon, finding his worst suspicion realized, seemed speechless with amazement, and, in his agony, mopped from his brow the drops collected there.

"You appear to be astonished at this," said Von Brent.

"I am very much astonished."

"Well, you cannot blame me. I have acted perfectly square in the matter. I had no idea Longworth and the gentleman who was with him had any connection with you whatever. Their attention had been drawn to the mine, they said, by that article. They had investigated it, and appeared to be satisfied there was something in it—in the mine, I mean, in the article. They said they had attended a meeting which you had called, but it was quite evident you were not going to be able to form the company. So they came here and made me a cash offer for the mine. They have deposited £20,000 at the bank here, and, on the day your option closes, they will give me a check for the amount."

"Serves me right," said Kenyon. "I have been cheated and duped. I had grave suspicions of it all along, but I did not act upon them. I have been too timorous and cowardly. This man Longworth has made a pretense of helping me to form a company. Everything he has done has been to delay me. He came out here apparently in the interest of the company I was forming, and now he has got the option for himself."

"Yes, he has," said Von Brent. "I may say I am very sorry indeed for the turn affairs have taken. Of course, as I have told you, I had no idea how the land lay. You see you had placed no deposit with me, and I had to look after my own interests. However, the option is open for a few days more, and I will not turn the mine over to them till the last minute of the time has expired. Isn't there any chance of your getting the money before then?"

"Not the slightest."

"Well, you see, in that case I cannot help myself. I am bound by a legal document to turn the mine over to them on receipt of the £20,000 the moment your option has expired. Everything is done legally, and I am perfectly helpless in the matter."

"Yes, I see that," said John. "Good-by." He went to the telegraph office and sent a cablegram.

Ten minutes passed the dispatch in London the next morning. It read; "We are cheated. Longworth has the option on the mine in his own name."

CHAPTER XXI.

When George Wentworth received this message he read it several times over before the full meaning dawned upon him. Then he paced up and down his room and gave way to his feelings. His best friends, who had been privileged to hear George's vocabulary when he was rather angry, admitted that the young man had a fluency of expression which was very much more terse than proper. When the real significance of the dispatch became apparent to him, George outdid himself in this particular line. Then he calmed down, however consolatory such language is to a very angry man, it does little good in any practical way. He paced silently up and down the room, wondering what he could do, and the more he wondered the less light he saw through the fog. He put on his hat and went into the other room.

"Henry," he said to his partner, "do you know anybody who would lend me £20,000?"

Henry laughed. The idea of anybody lending that sum of money except on the very best security was in itself extremely comic.

"Do you want it to-day?" he said.

"Yes, I want it to-day."

"Well, I don't know any better place than to go out into the street and ask every man if he has that sum about him. You are certain to meet men who have very much more than £20,000, and perhaps one of them, struck by your very sane appearance at the moment, might hand over the sum to you. I think, however, George, that you would be more successful if you met the capitalist in a secluded lane some dark night, and had a good reliable club in your hand."

"You are right," said George. "Of course, there is just as much possibility of my reaching the moon as getting that sum of money on short notice."

"We can lose nothing, either, I imagine. I know plenty of men who have the money, but I wouldn't undertake to ask them for it, and I don't believe you would. Still, there is nothing like trying. The whole thing has gone, but no one can succeed who doesn't try. Why not go to old Longworth? He could let you have the money in a moment if he wanted to do so. He knows you. What's your security, are you sure it is good with it—that eternal mine of yours?"

"Yes, that 'eternal mine.' I want it to be mine. That is why I need the £20,000.'

"Well, George, I don't see much hope for you. I never spoke to old Longworth about it, did you? He wasn't one of the men you intended to get into this company?"

"No, he was not. I wish he had been. He would have treated us better than his rascally nephew has done."

"Ah, that unmaculate young man has been playing you tricks, has he?"

"He has played me one trick, which is enough."

"Well, why don't you go and see the old man and lay the case before him? He treats that nephew as if he were his son. Now, a man will do a great deal for his son, and perhaps old Longworth might do something for his and so that killed your chances of forming a company in London. They were here, apparently, on their own business."

"And what was their business?"

"To buy the mine."

"Have they bought it?"

"Practically, yes. Of course, while your option holds good I cannot sell it but that, as you know, expires in a very few days."

Kenyon, finding his worst suspicion realized, seemed speechless with amazement, and, in his agony, mopped from his brow the drops collected there.

"I am very much astonished."

STRIKES AND SPARES.

The bowling team from the Plainfield Y. M. C. A. rolled their first games on their own alleys, last evening, against the team from the Westfield Y. M. C. A. Two games were rolled and the home team won both. Only two of this team that represented the Westfield's last year are bowling this year, and they did not roll as on former occasions. No high scores were made by either side, but this may be accounted for by the fact that the alleys have just been repaired and the bowlers did not have a chance to get used to them.

The individual scores were as follows:

PLAINFIELD Y. M. C. A.

	1st game	2 game
Sutphen, M.	160	151
Brinton	159	131
Sutphen, J.	114	169

CYCLING COMMENT.

The F. L. C. Martin Cycle Company has just received one of the '97 models of the ladies' Cleveland which has many desirable changes.

The recently formed bicycle club, the Cleveland Cyclers, held a meeting on Monday evening. It was decided to hold the first annual ball of the club on the evening of January 21, in Saengerbund hall.

The Eldridge Bicyle Company is exhibiting a full line of the Columbia and Hartford wheels for 1897. The wheels have a number of changes which are beneficial. The new plate is something novel.

TWO MILLION CAPITAL.

PLAINFIELD TO BE THE SEAT OF A STUPENDOUS ENTERPRISE.

James Clark at the Head of a Company to Supply Water to Plainfield or the Whole of New Jersey—To Deal in Stocks.

John Lynn, a Jersey City lawyer, filed in the County Clerk's office at Elizabeth, this morning, papers of incorporation for one of the largest enterprises ever undertaken in Plainfield. The incorporation is that of a water company capitalized at $2,000,000. James Clark, of West Seventh street and Central avenue, who is engaged in the wholesale leather business in New York, and is one of the wealthiest citizens of Plainfield, is at the head of the business. Associated with him is J. C. Rogers and Edward J. Farrell, both of New York, and well-known in the business world. There are 20,000 shares of stock in the company, valued at $100 per share. The sum of $5,000 will be paid in on the capital stock.

The company is organized to supply Plainfield and villages in New Jersey and elsewhere with portable water, the leasing or sale of the same to municipalities and other corporations, the dealing in municipal water bonds and other bonds and securities, and generally to do such business as is necessary and proper for the supplying of communities with water for public and private use.

Mr. Clark was interviewed at his home on West Seventh street, corner of Central avenue, by a Press reporter, Wednesday, but he had nothing to say regarding the new company, which is known as the New Jersey Water company. The article in yesterday's Daily Press, he said, was correct. Now that the company has been formed, he remarked that the next thing to do was to find the business. Besides the last remark, he absolutely refused to say anything about the interest at present.

Mr. Clark has at different times been largely interested in water interests in New Jersey, at one time owning valuable rights in Pequonnock lake. The Lehigh Valley Railroad Company brought suit against him at one time for lowering the water level of the lake and its tributaries, which acted as a feeder for a canal operated by them. Mr. Clark engaged the late Benjamin Butler as counsel, and defeated the railroad company. He was also one of the original organizers of the Plainfield Water Supply Company.

PARTICULAR MENTION.

Frank Wyckoff, of North avenue, has recovered from a severe illness.

Miss Mamie Reniger, of Watchung avenue, has returned from a visit spent with relatives in Morristown.

Lawrence B. Bromfield was elected chaplain of Plainfield Council, Royal Arcanum, at their annual election and not E. C. Pease, as reported. Mr. Pease was solicited to be re-elected, but declined the honor.

Sent to Reform School.

The two Plainfield boys, Louis Milligan and Charles Wilson, who stole a bag containing $750 and some valuable papers from the home of William Cortright, several weeks ago, were arraigned in the County Court this morning. Judge DeMeza, of this city, made a plea for the Judge to send to Reform School owing to their youth. Judge McCormick gave the culprits a short lecture and committed them to the Reform School.

Destitute and Sick.

Jacob Snyder, an aged man, was found in a destitute condition, yesterday, in a room in Stiger's alley, where he was confined with pneumonia. He was removed to the hospital for treatment.

An Ordinary Offender.

Werner Pierson was fined $5 in the city court this morning by Judge DeMeza for being drunk and disorderly on Park avenue last night. He was arrested by Patrolman Totten.

"Support the Constitution, Which is the Cement of the Union, as Well in Its Limitations as in Its Authorities."—Madison.

BRILLIANT ADIEU TO MR. GILBERT'S MAYORALITY.

THE COMPLIMENTARY DINNER THE MOST DISTINGUISHED AFFAIR EVER HELD IN THIS CITY.

The Guest of Honor Fairly Surprised His Friends by the Excellence of His Farewell Remarks to the Office Which He Has So Honorably Filled For Several Terms—Good Toasts and Speeches Given By the Others Present.

After enjoying all the honors and perquisites and enduring the trials and tribulations of six years service as the chief executive for so creditable a city as Plainfield, such an outpouring of eulogy and esteem as found favor at the complimentary dinner to Mayor Gilbert at the Casino Tuesday must have left a bright spot on the life escutcheon of the distinguished guest of the occasion.

To be in the midst of nearly two hundred gentlemen—friends and admirers everyone—many exceptionally distinguished in the world's eye, and all of standing and influence, to hear words of praise for things which have been accomplished and for the part that one has taken—the latter embossed with the flow of approbation of men skilled in the subtlty of oratory and words—in a phrase, to be dined, wined and toasted, the essence of goodfellowship, was the congenial position of Mr. Alexander Gilbert for five hours last night.

It was, indeed, a notable affair, this dinner to the Mayor. Never before in the history of Plainfield has there been such a gathering of men whose brilliant efforts have gained them a place a little higher in life than their humbler neighbors. Conceived of a desire to express fitting appreciation of the time and the ability with which Mr. Gilbert has performed the functions of a chief officer for a progressive people, it was an eminent success, and it was more than the mere satisfying of an inclination to express acknowledgment of services; it proved an inspiration to Mr. Gilbert's successor, and to all his coworkers, in that a sense of knowing that gratitude is not a dormant quality in the public mind of Plainfield is sure to incur in them the aim to do even better in municipal government than has their predecessor. And to do even as well and share in such amenities to their office as was experienced last night by Mr. Gilbert, is incentive enough.

It was 7:30 o'clock when the guests sat down to the dinner. Caterer Wertz had done his best to arrange the interior of the place in consonance with the notability of the occasion. The table decorations were elaborate in every detail. The guests of the honor of the night were arranged on the eastern side of the room, slightly elevated, while the remaining tables diverged from it in fan like arrangement.

On the stage, obscured from view by a pretty arrangement of potted palms and other plants, was seated an orchestra that wafted sweet strains of popular airs to the ears of guests while the dinner was in progress. The menu consisted of nine courses and was delectable in every way.

The serving of the dinner occupied a little over two hours and in the interim before the toasts were responded to the guests indulged in passing conversation and pleasantries. Once or twice as some popular air was struck up by the orchestra, a few of the more joyful and musical accompanied it with the words, but these was but few instances of this.

Rowland Cox made a dignified toastmaster, and after cigars had been lighted and all were in mood for eulogy and witticism, Mr. Cox active ly assumed the duties, for which he had been selected, in a clever speech, appropriate to the occasion. Before introducing Mr. Gilbert, who was to respond to "Our Mayor," Mr Cox proposed a toast to His Honor Suiting the word all arose and drank to his health.

Then Mr. Gilbert made response in an interesting and impassive manner. In part he said:

Mr. Chairman, Neighbors and Friends—I am not inclined to over much indulgence in sentiment; I am rather disposed to take a pfactical view of life, but I shall not undertake to conceal the emotions which hold possession of me at this time. The situation you have placed me in makes me almost afraid to feel of my own head. I am being played upon by thoughts and fancies which tend to distort my view of life and my relation to it; I am fighting these influences tonight. I have no desire to catch, even for a moment, an exaggerated glimpse of myself, or of the niche which I fill in life. If there is anything in a man's experience that would seem to justify a little bit of self-conceit, it is just such a situation as this—to live for one short hour in a world created especially for himself, in which the sweetest music that falls upon his ears are the words which sound his own praise, and where the only occupation of the people is to eat and drink and honor him. What boots it that it all may prove a delusion, a passing vision, a bit of unreality, a temporary disturbance of the grey matter of the brain, 'tis pleasant while it lasts, and the memory of it will linger way on into the future years.

I do not overlook the fact that notwithstanding all the honor and distinction you thrust upon me tonight, that after tonight my light will begin to pale; the glory with which you have invested me will gradually fade, until what remains will lack sufficiency of substance to cast even a shadow upon the little world of Plainfield politics. I find consolation in the thought that my fate is not different from that which, as a rule, overtakes men in public life. It is the irony of fate that men who fill important places in public affairs of today, will be lost sight of in the estimate of in future generations; it is only the man of pre-eminent genius who can hone to survive the wreck which time makes of political reputations.

I have been thinking while sitting here tonight contemplating this dinner, trying in a modest way to put a plausible interpretation upon it, that the importance of the service which, in my official capacity, I have rendered the city must be very much exaggerated by the community; in no other way can I account for this warm and cordial greeting.

Holmes says that every man has three separate and distinct personalities—himself as he thinks he is; himself as his friends and neighbors thinks he is; and himself as he is. Luckily for me the person masquerading before you tonight is himself as his friends and neighbors see him, and not himself as he really is; otherwise this great distinction would never have come to me.

But seriously, friends, I have done nothing to deserve this. I have not been a martyr; I have not suffered trial or hardship as you chief executive; on the contrary my official life has brought me much joy. I have felt the intense thrills of transient popularity; the quickened energy that comes from factious opposition; the pleasure that comes to the man who has twenty offices to bestow upon a hundred applicants. In my capacity as City Judge I have had opportunities to practice mercy for the comfort of some, and to deal out stern justice for the discomfort of others. And lastly, I have enjoyed that state of mind which passeth understanding and which can only be understoood by the man who carries in his pocket a postal card upon which is written: "Prepare to die, you will be shot on sight." Bill Nye once wrote of George III that sixty years was a long time to be a monarch, if he had to look under the bed every night for a nihilist loaded with a cut glass bomb and paris green. And I may add that the receipt of one such postal card as I have received for my influence on a man's desire for public life.

I can also say that I have enjoyed the distinction of being the Mayor of the city. I have not underrated the honor which the office confers; it is the highest office in the gift of the people, and the man who fills it worthily should never forget that he is the representative of the intelligence and progressive spirit of the people, and that any worthy act of his official or his private life will cast reproach upon the people he represents. When the character of the of Plainfield is considered, any man may well feel an honest pride in being called upon to represent them. A man with a less exalted opinion of the office should never be selected to occupy it.

As I look about me tonight and behold the familiar faces of the friends of many years; many of whom knew me in my young manhood; some of whom were associated with me in the struggles of our early municipal life, and others who during the passing years have been drawn within the circle of my acquaintance, and realize that this occasion is a testimonial of their regard for, me, an approval of my life as they have known it, and especially of my official life, I cannot but feel flattered and satisfied, and I may add, that if it can possibly be made to appear that I have during the tenure of my official life rendered this community any important service, this manifestation of your esteem and confidence more than commensates me.

There is nothing more satisfying to my ambition than public approval; the confidence and respect of my fellow men. It is that which makes life worth living; that stimulates a man to his best and strongest efforts.

The past six years comprise, perhaps, the most important period in the history of Plainfield. They have been years of marked growth and development. Water and sewers and street railways have been introduced during this period, and the important principle has been established that no special board can create indebtedness against the city without the consent of the governing body. While this growth and development has not been without friction and struggle, it has awakened public pride and brought about a more liberal spirit on the part of the people touching the improvement of the city. It has been my good fortune during this period to have occupied a prominent public place, to have exerted an influence and to have contributed something of my thought and energy towards the solution of difficult municipal problems.

I esteem it a great honor to have my name associated with this period of Plainfield's history;—to feel that in after years when some enterprising historian shall gather together the material for a history of our city, the period from 1890 to 1896, will make an important and interesting chapter, and that perhaps it may fall to my lot to have modest mention in the chapter.

We should all feel an honest pride in doing what we can to make Plainfield an ideal city. It is our home; the place where our families are to pass their lives, and find what happiness life may have in store for them. The more beautiful we can make the city; the more healthy we can make it; the more convenient we can make it, the more pleasure we can add to our home life. We must cultivate for ourselves, and try to awaken in others the largest and most enlightened public spirit. We must get out of the habit we have fallen into of criticizing our tax bills with a miserly instinct. Our tax bills cover expenditures which are as necessary to our well-being as many other of the necessities and luxuries of life. What matters it if they are a little larger some years than others, so long as we get what we need and what we pay for. If our tax bills were presented weekly instead of yearly, they would seem to be trifling and would be paid without grumbling as our grocer and butcher bills are. Extravagance and unnecessary expenditure should always be condemned, and so should a mean short-sighted policy that will prevent the proper expansion of the city.

Along these lines as citizens we should all work; the years of our lives are swiftly passing by, if we have any desire to exert an influence for good in the community, let us as citizens do what we can, while we can, to make the city of our homes more beautiful, if possible, grander and nobler in her municipal influence—let us do it at the cost of self denial, if necessary—at all events let us do it by laying aside the partisan spirit in municipal politics and giving heed to the duties of good citizenship.

At the conclusion of his remarks there was enthusiastic applause. Mayor-elect Fisk then responded to "Our Next Mayor." His remarks provoked much laughter. They were as follows:

What has been accomplished for the city of Plainfield during the administration of Alexander Gilbert is best known to those who have been associated with him. During the last five years it has been my pride to be a member of the Council and I shall always look back with pleasure and feel it an honor to have served in the Council during Mr. Gilbert's administration.

Since 1890 the population of Plainfield has increased over one half. We have grown from a small, I might say village, into a city government. When Mr. Gilbert went into office the finances of the city were in such a shape that it was impossible to tell, without a great deal of labour, how the money was spent. One of his first acts was to have the financial system remodelled and now any citizen can tell exactly where the money has been spent and how it has been spent by simply applying to the clerk for information. When he first took office we depended for our supply of water on wells—now we have a system of waterworks which, although not owned by the city, supplies us with the best of drinking water and with such a pressure that for fire purposes we do not need to use a steamer. Our fire department, which was then but poorly equipped, is now the best equipped fire department of any in the State, having the best and most approved apparatus and with a force of firemen all under the best discipline. Our police department has been organized and is now considered one of the best for a city of our size. During the last three years a system of sewerage has been introduced and completed.

In a word, during Mr. Gilbert's administration the city has made strides forward and he retires from office with every department in first class working condition and the city in the best financial shape and all that remains for us is to go on and complete the good work. If our foresight was as good as our hindsight we might predict the future but, so far, I have been able to find only one man who was willing to predict what would happen within the next two years.

This gentleman, as you all know, is none other than the Hon. James E. Martine, familiarly known as "Farmer Jim." Not being willing that you should be led astray without due notice, he told you what you might expect if I was elected as your chief executive officer. He has predicted a most extravagant administration—he has told you that I was no friend of the poor, that the poor would be taxed for the benefit of the rich—that I wished to change my business and drive an ash cart, thus depriving our colored friends of their means of livelihood. So persistent was he in this that on his final call in my power to covering these points which was distributed after midnight the night before election, but some others not thinking this was quite true and being on to Jim's curves started out at 2 o'clock in the morning and gathered up all the circulars before sunrise. Although this circular distinctly states that Mr. Martine knew nothing about it but that it was written by a friend in a burst of confidence Jim has admitted since election that it cost him $25 to have them printed and distributed and that little fat cuss Charlie Fisk had them all gathered up, so that he might as well have saved his money.

What I would like to see for Plainfield would be that it should be the model city not only of the county but of the world. The best and most economically governed, the best paved and lighted, the best and most healthful city to live in, the most enterprising and in every way a model municipality, and it shall be my aim during my administration to do all in my power to bring it as near this point as possible.

Just now Plainfield is in the position of a young lady with many lovers. We are wanted by Somerset and Middlesex and also by an entirely new party of friends who wish to centre around us as a new county, making Plainfield the county seat. There are still others who want to stick to the old love and have our friends and neighbors come come to us. We know that in the other end of this county there is a troublesome place called Elizabeth, that is always grasping for everything that she can secure; still, with better management, we have no doubt it can be brought under control. They are a "Fowler" city than we are—we know that they grabbed a charter and stole our water and are railing "Kean" with our wells. At times they "Bankin" our tempers and they raise a monkey and a "Parrott" time with our wills and estates. They have their Montana Club where they corrall all the judges and high officials and set up schemes with their "Wooden" and "Ruff" house committee, but still notwithstanding this great combination and the intervention of the spirits, we succeeded last November in erecting our own little "Kirk" on the most beautiful and sacred spot in Union county, even if Elizabeth did cut our majority over 1,200. Still there are certain good things in Elizabeth—she is still noted for her good old "Bergen dy" and we not only "Foster" her no ill but love her still and willing to have Craig Marsh all the forces and stand by her.

We do not care to "Press" or "Force" any one but will send our proposals by our "Couriers" and when our friends and neighbors get ready to join us, we will have Charley-Reed the marriage ceremony and your future Mayor will be ready to welcome them into the Union.

The health of Mr. Fisk was also drank by the guests.

Congressman Charles N. Fowler, of Elizabeth, responded to the toast of "Our Country." A slight resemblance to Major McKinley in personal appearance and an interesting personality, Mr. Fowler did full justice to the toast that found its intent in these lines:

My Country, right or wrong: if right, to be Kept right, and if wrong, to be set right.

In commencing Mr. Fowler said that each one first viewed the country from the point of view of the surroundings that they first saw light of day, but as time passed on and they entered into manhood and developed their energies and capabilities the greatness of the country seemed to

WASHINGTONVITLE PEOPLE RAISING MONEY FOR THAT PURPOSE.

The Railway People Are Willing to Go to Mt. Park Inn That Way and Property Owners Are Willing to Do Their Share.

Washingtonville wants the trolley, or at least most of her citizens do, and the trolley wants Washingtonville. And as it is agreeable to both sides, another year is likely to see the street railway extended up the Notch to Washingtonville; meanwhile the residents of that little place are working to get the road in that direction.

It has long been the wish of the Plainfield Street railway to extend its lines up to the Mountain Park Inn. It was originally planned to have the road run up this side of the mountain, following Jenning's lane and reach the Inn by that path. It was then suggested that the trolley should run over to Washingtonville on the other side of the valley and up the easy grade in the Notch. At Washingtonville the line would turn to the right and then go up the side of the mountain which is not as steep on that side as on the other. It would, of course, make the road considerably longer and there would be some grading to be done.

The trolley would benefit Washingtonville while that place would also benefit the road. The company was willing to go that way providing the people of that neighborhood would be willing to bear part of the expense of running the tracks up there and the grading. The company agreed that if the residents of Washingtonville would give $500 toward the extra expense incurred in running the trolley through that village, they would pay the rest of it.

Those in favor of the trolley were headed by Robert Clark, Jr., Theodore Luersen and W. H. Rogers, all of whom reside in the valley, and own property there. They worked among their fellow residents and succeeded in raising about $300 toward that object. They have now decided to call a meeting of the citizens interested in the project, to talk it over and raise the rest of the necessary amount. The meeting will probably be held this week.

The funds subscribed will be paid as soon as asked for and will be deposited in the bank to the credit of Mr. Clark, who will turn it over to the company as soon as the line is completed. The promoters of the trolley in Washingtonville are very confident that before another winter the trolley cars will be running up to Washingtonville as regularly as they now run to Dunellen.

GAME MEN HAVE DINNER

AFTER THE MENU CAME A FLOW OF ORATORY AND JOCULARITY.

The Event Given in Gesang and Turn Verein Hall and a Pleasant One It Was Throughout—Game Constituted the Meat.

The first annual dinner of the Protective Game and Propagating Association of Union, Middlesex and Somerset counties, was held Monday in Gesang and Turn Verein Hall, on Somerset street. The affair was a pleasant one throughout, and those fortunate enough to be present will long remember it.

The menu was very fine and consisted chiefly of game. Covers were spread for thirty-five members and a few friends. About two hours was consummed at the table, after which there was a flow of oratory from President J. Goff, Vice-President Joseph A. Blatz, Percy C. Ohl, Justice Newcorn, of Plainfield; E. B. Haws, of Newark. A song was given by James Phillips entitled, "There's Life in the Old Boy Yet."

The remarks and songs were heartily cheered throughout, and it was nearly 1 o'clock this morning when the event came to a close.

Dr. Haws, E. H. Haws, of Newark, and Neaf Apgar were present as guests. Credit is due Mrs. Joseph Haurand who so efficiently prepared the dinn r and to Henry Haurand who was master of ceremonies.

RAN WITHOUT A DRIVER.

Carl Kaerth's Team Indulged in a Fractious Dash Last Night.

An exciting runaway was witnessed Monday about 8 o'clock, when Carl Kaerth's fractious team of horses, that have run away so often, took another wild dash. They were attached to the heavy delivery wagon.

Mr. Kaerth says that the horses left him at Sandford avenue and they ran down Front street to Park avenue. They did not attain any speed until they passed into Park avenue. The wagon struck the fire hydrant on Kenney's corner and sparks of fire flew in every direction. This did not stop them, however, and they went on at terrific speed. Winfield Coddington caught one horse in the flight, but he was thrown in the roadway and narrowly escaped injury.

At the corner of Park avenue and Second street, the team ran up on the sidewalk, near the night lunch-wagon, and before they had an opportunity of going through Marsh, Ayres & Co.'s store, a young man named Pierson came to the rescue and held them until Patrolman Vanderwerp appeared and took charge. A few minutes later Mr. Kaerth appeared and succeeded in getting his wagon to his bottling establishment on East Second street. The front part of the wagon was complete wreck, but no other damage resulted.

SLEIGH UPSET, HORSE RUN AWAY.

The Animal Not Recovered by the Owner Till This Morning.

A lively runaway was witnessed on West Front street, Tuesday, in which a horse and sleigh owned by W. O. Baldwin, cut a great figure. The horse was being driven by Mr. Baldwin's son. The sleigh caught in the street car tracks in front of the Babcock building and upset, throwing the driver out. The horse then ran down West Front street, and in the flight the sleigh was completely wrecked.

About 12:30 o'clock Wednesday some boys found the horse at Washingtonville and returned with it to this city, when Patrolman Totten took charge of the animal and placed him in Roberts' livery stable. This morning Mr. Baldwin called and got the horse. His son was not injured, neither was the horse. Wilbur F. Cornwall, of Waynewood place, in attempting to catch the horse when he started, was thrown down and just escaped injury.

Married for Thirty Years.

Mr. and Mrs. H. P. Pugh, of 954 West Fourth street, celebrated the thirty anniversery of the wedding last Tuesday. A pleasant feature of the event was the reading of a poem by Rev. W. C. O'Donnell, which was composed by him in comemoration of the celebration. Miss Winter, of Ulster County, New York gave two recitations commendably. During the evening there were several selections. The house was beautified with an arrangement of evergreens and bunting. The bride and groom received many useful and costly presents from their relatives and friends. There were about thirty guests present from Plainfield and New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Coiles T. Pond, of Willow avenue, have returned from New York, where Mrs. Pond has been superintending the exhibit of the Keramic Art Club at the Commercial Travelers' Fair in the Madison Square Garden.

THE MISTRESS of the Mine.

or A Woman Interviewed.

By Robert Barr.

[Copyright, 1895, by Robert Barr.]

"Did he say," she spoke at length, "in what way William had done wrong?"

nephew is a scoundrel or not?"

Mr. Longworth mused for a few moments on what the young man had told him.

"If what you say is exactly true, there is no doubt that William has been guilty of a piece of very sharp practice."

"Sharp practice!" cried the other. "You might as well call robbery sharp practice!"

"My dear sir, I have listened to you; now I ask you to listen to me. If, as I say, what you have stated is true, my nephew has done something which I think an honorable man would not do; but as to that I cannot judge until I hear the side of the story. It may put a different complexion on the matter, and I have no doubt it will; but, even granting your version is true in every particular, what have I to do with it? I am not responsible for my nephew's actions. He has entered into a business connection, it seems, with two young men and has outwitted them. That is probably what the world would say about it. Perhaps, as you say, he has been guilty of something worse, and has cheated his partners. But even admitting everything to be true, I do not see how I am responsible in any way."

"Legally, you are not; morally, I think, you are."

"Why so?"

"If he were your son—"

"But he is not my son; he is my nephew."

"If your son had committed a theft, would you not do everything in your power to counteract the evil he had done?"

"I might and I might not. Some fathers pay their son's debts, others do not. I cannot say what action I should take in a purely supposititious case."

"Very well, all I have to say is, our option runs out in two or three days. Twenty thousand pounds will secure the mine for us. I want that £20,000 before the option ceases."

"And do you expect me to pay you £20,000 for this?"

"Yes, I do."

Old Mr. Longworth leaned back in his office chair and looked at the young man in amazement.

"You are, you, a man of the city, would come to me, another man of the city, with such an absurd idea in your head, is simply grotesque."

"Then the name of the Longworths is nothing to you—the good name, I mean?"

"The good name of the Longworths, my dear sir, is everything to me; but I think it will be able to take care of itself without any assistance from you."

There was silence for a few moments. Then Wentworth said in a voice of suppressed anguish: "I thought, Mr. Longworth, one of your family was a devil. I now wish to say I believe the epithet covers uncle as well as nephew. You have a chance to repair the mischief one of your family has done. You have answered me with contempt. You have not shown me the slightest indication of wishing to make amends."

He unlocked the door.

"Come, now," said old Mr. Longworth, rising, "that will do, that will do, Mr. Wentworth." Then he pressed an electric bell, and when the clerk appeared, he said: "Show this young gentleman the door, please, and if he ever calls again, do not admit him."

And so George Wentworth, clenching his hands with rage, was shown to the door. He had spent the rest of the day to ponder on the fact that an angry man seldom accomplishes his purpose.

CHAPTER XXII.

The stormy interview with Wentworth disturbed the usual serenity of Mr. Longworth's evening. He went home earlier than was customary with him that night, and the more he thought over the attack, the more unjustifiable it seemed. He wondered what his nephew had been at, and tried to remember what Wentworth had charged against him. He could not recollect, the angrier portions of the interview having, as it were, blotted the charges from his mind. There remained, however, a bitter resentment against Wentworth. Mr. Longworth searched his conscience to see if he could be in the least to blame, but he found nothing in the recollection of his dealings with the young men to justify him in feeling at all responsible for the disaster that had overtaken them. He read his favorite evening paper with less than his usual interest, for every now and then the episode in his office would crop up in his mind. Finally he said sharply:

"Edith?"

"Yes, father," answered his daughter.

"You remember a person named Wentworth whom you had here the evening William went away?"

"Yes, father."

"Very well. Never invite him to this house again."

"What has he been doing?" asked the young woman, in a rather tremulous voice.

"I desire you never to ask anyone connected with him, that man Kenyon, for instance," continued her father, ignoring her question.

"I thought," she answered, "that Mr. Kenyon was not in this country at present."

"He is not; but he will be back again, I suppose. At any rate I wish to have nothing more to do with those people. You understand that?"

"Yes, father."

—The English language is spoken by only about 125,000,000 persons, while the Chinese is spoken by over 400,000,000.

but knew enough of human nature to believe that, in a very short time, he would relieve her anxiety. He again appeared to be trying to fix his attention on the paper. Then he threw it down and turned toward her.

"That man Wentworth," he said, bitterly, "behaved to-day in a most unjustifiable manner to me in my office. It seems that William and he and Kenyon embarked in some mine project. I knew nothing of their doings, and was not even consulted with regard to them. Now it appears William has gone to America and done something Wentworth considers wrong. Wentworth came to me and demanded £20,000—the most preposterous thing ever heard of—said I owed it to clear the good name of Longworth, as if the good name were dependent on him, or any one like him. I turned him out of the office."

Edith did not answer for a few moments, while her father gave expression to his indignation by various ejaculations that need not be recorded.

"Did he say," she spoke at length, "in what way William had done wrong?"

"I do not remember now just what he said. I know I told him to come again when he knew he was present, and then make his charges against him, if he wanted to do so. Not that I admitted I had anything to do with the matter at all, but I simply refused to listen to charges against an absent man. I paid no attention to them."

"That certainly was reasonable," replied Edith. "What did he say to it?"

"Oh, he abused me, and abused William, and went on at a dreadful rate, until I was obliged to order him out of the office."

"But what did he say about meeting William at your office and making the charges against him then?"

"What did he say? I don't remember. Oh, yes, he said it would be too late then; that they had only a few days to do what business they have to do, and that is why he made the demand for £20,000. It was to repair the harm, whatever the harm was, William had done. I took it simply as some blackmailing scheme of his, and I am astonished that a man belonging to as good a house as he does should try that game with me. I shall speak to the elder partner about it to-morrow, and if he does not put a stop to the man's apologize in the most abject manner, he will be the loser by it, I can tell him that."

"I would think no more about it, father, if I were you. Do not let it trouble you in the least."

"Oh, it doesn't trouble me; but young men nowadays seem to think they can say anything to their elders."

"I mean," she continued, "that I would not go to his partner for a day or two. Wait and see what happens. I have no doubt when he thinks over the matter, he will be thoroughly ashamed of himself."

"Well, I hope so!"

"Then give him the chance of being ashamed of himself, and take no further steps in the matter."

Edith, very shortly afterward, went to her own room, and there, clasping her hands behind her, she walked up and down, thinking with a very troubled heart, on what she had heard. Her view of the matter was very different from that of her father. She felt certain something wrong had been done by her cousin. For a long time she had distrusted the friendship of Kenyon for the two young men, and now she pictured to herself John Kenyon in the wilds of Canada, helpless and despondent because of the great wrong that had been done him. It was far into the night when she retired, and it was early the next morning when she arose. Her time was bright and cheerful at breakfast, and had evidently forgotten all about the unpleasant incident of the day before. A good night's sleep had erased it from her memory. Edith was glad of this, she did not mention the subject. After he had gone to the city the young woman prepared to follow him. She did not take her carriage, but hailed a hansom and gave the driver the number of Wentworth's offices. That young man was evidently somewhat surprised to see her. He had been trying to write to Kenyon some account of his interview with old Mr. Longworth, and, somehow, after he had finished it, he thought John Kenyon would not at all approve of his zeal, so had just torn the letter up.

"Take this chair," he said, wheeling an armchair into position. "It is the only comfortable one we have in the room."

"Comfort does not matter," said Miss Longworth; "I came to see you about Kenyon."

Negro to be Electrocuted.

White Plains, N. Y., Dec. 23.—John Henry Barker, colored, was convicted of murder in the first degree in the supreme court yesterday and sentenced to be electrocuted during the first week in February next. Barker shot and killed his wife in August last.

To Enforce Prize-Fight Law.

Albany, Dec. 23.—Gov. Morton has sent a letter to Sheriff Doolin of Queens county requesting him to enforce the laws with respect to the prize-fight announced to take place at Long Island city to-night.

"Kenyon is in Ottawa. I had a cablegram from him yesterday."

"Then will you write a cablegram that can be sent away at once asking him to wait at the telegraph office until he gets a further message from you?"

"Yes, I can do that; but what good will it do?"

"Never mind what good it will do; perhaps it will do no good. I am going to try to make it of some good. Meanwhile, remember, if I succeed, John Kenyon must not hear of the particulars of this transaction."

"He never will; if you say so."

"I say so. Now it is six hours earlier here than it is in Canada, is it not?"

"About that length of time, I think."

"Very well, lose no time in getting the cablegram off to him, and tell him to answer, so that we shall be sure he is at the other end of the wire. Then find out about the cabling of the money. I shall be back here, I think, about the same time you are."

With that she left the office, and, getting into her cab, was driven to her father's place of business.

"Well, my girl," said the old man, shoving his spectacles up on his brow and gazing at her, "what is it now, some new extravagance?"

"Yes, father, some new extravagance." His daughter was evidently excited, and her breath came quickly. She closed the door and took a chair opposite her father.

"Father," she said, "I have been your business man, as you call me now, for a long time."

"Yes, you have. Are you going to strike for an increase in salary?"

"Father," she said, earnestly, not heeding the jocularity of his tone, "this is very serious. I want you to give me some money for myself—to speculate with."

"I will do that very gladly. How much do you want?" The old man turned his chair round and pulled out his check book.

"I want £30,000," she answered.

Mr. Longworth wheeled quickly round on her and looked at her in astonishment. "Thirty thousand what?"

"Thirty thousand pounds, father, and I want it now—and I want it in cash."

"My dear girl," he expostulated, "have you any idea how much £30,000 is? Do you know that £30,000 is a fortune?"

"Yes, I know that."

"Do you know that there is not one in twenty of the richest merchants in London who could, at a moment's notice, produce £30,000 pounds in ready money?"

"Yes; I suppose that is true. Have you not the ready money?"

"Yes; I have the money. I can draw a check for that amount, but it will be honored at once; but I cannot give you so much money without knowing what you are going to do with it."

"And suppose, father, you do not approve of what I am going to do with it?"

"All the more reason, my dear, that I should know."

"Then, father, I suppose you mean that whatever service I have rendered you—whatever comfort I have given you—what I have been to you all my life is not worth £30,000."

"You shouldn't talk like that, daughter. Everything I have is yours, or will be when I die. It is for you I work. It is for you I accumulate money. You will be a rich woman the moment I have to lay down my work."

"Father," cried the young girl, standing up before him, "I do not want your money when you die. I do not want you to die at all, but I tell you now that I do want £30,000 to-day, and now. I want it more than I ever wanted anything else before in my life, or ever shall again. Will you give it to me?"

"No, I will not; unless you tell me what you are going to do with it."

"Then, father, you can leave your money to your nephew when you die. I shall never touch a penny of it. I now bid you good-by. I will go out from your house and from my own living."

With that the young woman turned to go, but her father, with a sprightliness one would not have expected from his years, sprang to the door and locked it before with a turn.

"Edith, my child, you never talked to me like this before in your life. What is wrong with you?"

"Nothing, father, except that I want a check for £30,000, and want it now."

"And do you mean to say that you will leave me if I do not give it to you?"

"Have you ever broken your word, father?"

"Never, my child, that I know of."

"Then remember I am your daughter. I have said if I do not get that money now I shall never enter our house again."

"But £30,000 is a tremendous amount. Remember that I have given you my word, too, that I would not give you the money unless you tell me what it was for."

"Very well, father, I will tell you what it is for when you ask me, and I would advise you to give me the money. It will all be returned to you if you want it."

"Oh, I don't care about the money at all, Edith. I merely, of course, don't want to see it wasted."

"And, father, have you no trust in my judgment?"

"Well, you know I haven't much faith in any woman's judgment in the matter of investing money."

"Trust me this time, father, I shall never ask you for any more."

The old man went slowly to his desk, wrote out a check, and handed it to his daughter. It was for £30,000.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Edith Longworth, with that precious bit of paper in her pocket, once more got into her hansom and drove to Wentworth's office. Again she took the only easy chair in the room. Her face was very serious, and Wentworth, the moment she saw it, said to himself: "She has failed."

"Have you telegraphed to Mr. Kenyon?" she asked.

"Yes."

"Are you sure you made it clear to him that he was wanted? Cablegrams are apt to be rather brief."

"I told him to keep in communication with us. Here is a copy of the cablegram."

Miss Longworth read it approvingly, but said:

"You have not put in the word 'answer.'"

"No, but I put it in the dispatch I sent. I remember that now."

"Have you had an answer yet?"

"Oh, no; you see it was a long time to get there because there are so many changes from the end of the cable to the office at which Kenyon is. And then again, you see, they may have to look for him. He may not be expecting a message at all, but I am sure not to be expecting any. From his own cablegram to me, it is quite evident he has given up all hope."

"Show me that cablegram, please," Wentworth hesitated. "It is hardly couched in language you will like to read," he said.

"That doesn't matter. Show it to me. I must see all the documents in the case." He handed her the paper, which she read in a silence, and gave it back to him without a word.

"I knew you wouldn't like it," he said.

"I have not said I do not like it. It is not a bit too strong under the circumstances. In fact I do not see how he could have put it in other words. It is very concise and to the point."

"Yes, there is no doubt about that, especially the first three words: 'We are cheated.' Those are the words that make me think Kenyon has given up all hope, and so there will be some difficulty in finding him."

"Did you learn whether money could be sent him by cable?"

"Oh, yes; there is no difficulty about that. The money is deposited in a bank here and will be credited to Kenyon in the bank at Ottawa."

"Very well, then," said Miss Longworth, handing him the piece of paper, "there is the money."

Wentworth gave a long whistle as he looked at it.

"Excuse my rudeness," he said; "I don't see a bit of paper like this every day. You mean, then, to buy the mine?"

"Yes, I mean to buy the mine."

"Very well, but there is £10,000 more here than is necessary."

"Yes. I mean not only to buy the mine, but to work it; and some working capital will be necessary. How much, do you suppose?"

"About that," said Wentworth. "I have no idea. I should think that £5,000 would be ample."

"Then we will draw for £5,000 in the bank here for the contingencies, and we will cable £25,000 to Mr. Kenyon. I shall expect him to get me a good man to manage the mine; I am sure he will be glad to do that."

"Most certainly he will. John Kenyon, now that the mine has not fallen into the hands of those who tried to cheat him, will be glad to do anything for the new owner of it. He won't mind, in the least, losing his money if he knows that you have the mine."

"Ah, but that is the one thing he must not know. As to losing the money, neither you nor Mr. Kenyon are to lose a penny. If the mine is all you think it is, then it will be a very profitable investment, and I intend that we shall each take our third, just as if you had contributed one-third of the money and Mr. Kenyon the other."

"But, my dear Miss Longworth, that is absurd. We could never accept any such terms."

"Oh, yes, you can. I spoke to John Kenyon myself about being a partner in this mine. I am afraid he thought very little about it at the time. I don't intend him to know anything at all about my ownership now. He has discovered the mine—you and he together. If it is valueless, then you and he will be two of the sufferers; if it is all you think it is, then you will be the gainers. 'The laborer is worthy of his hire,' and I am sure both you and Mr. Kenyon have labored hard enough in this venture. If he knows I have bought it, the chances are he will be stupidly and stubbornly conscientious, and will take none of the fruits of his labors."

"And you think, Miss Longworth, I am not conscientious enough to refuse?"

"Oh, yes, you are conscientious, but you are mistaken about that. He is one of the most sensible men in the world, morbidly sensible, perhaps."

"Well, I think if Mr. Kenyon knew I owned the mine, he would not take a penny as his share. So I trust you will never let him know I am the person who gave the money to buy the mine."

"But is he never to know it, Miss Longworth?"

"Perhaps not. But if he is to know, I am the person to tell him."

"I quite agree with you there; and I shall respect your confidence."

"Now, what time," said the young lady, looking at her watch, "ought we to get an answer from Mr. Kenyon?"

"Ah, that, as I said before, no one can tell."

"I suppose, then, the best plan is to send the money at once, or put it in the way of being sent, to some bank in Ottawa."

"Yes, that is the best thing to do, although, of course, if John Kenyon is not there—"

"If he is not there, what shall we do?"

"I do not exactly know. I could cable to Mr. Von Brent. Von Brent is the owner of the mine, and the man who gave John the option. I do not know how far he is connected to the others. If he is as honest as I take him to be, he will accept the money, provided it is sent in before twelve o'clock, and then we shall have the mine. Of that I know nothing, however, because I have no particulars except John's cable message."

"Then I can do no more just now?"

"Yes, you can. You will have to write out a check for the £25,000. You see this check is crossed, and will go into your banking account. Another check will have to be drawn to get the money out."

"Ah, I see. I have not my check book here, but perhaps you can send this check to the bank and I will return. There will be time enough, I suppose, before the closing hour of the bank."

"Yes, there will be plenty of time. Of course, the sooner we get the money away the better."

I will return shortly after lunch. Perhaps you will have heard from Mr.

"Don't spare money on it," said the young lady "Be sure and make it plain to him."

Kenyon by then. If anything comes sooner, will you send me a telegram? Here is my address."

"I will do that," said Wentworth, as he bade her good-by.

As soon as lunch was over Miss Longworth, with her check book, went again to Wentworth's office. When she entered he shook his head.

"No news yet," he said.

"No news is terrible," she answered. "Suppose he has left Ottawa and started for home?"

"I do not think he would do that. Still, I imagine he would think there was no reason for staying in Ottawa. Nevertheless, I know Kenyon well enough to believe that he will wait there till the last minute of the option has expired in the hope that something may happen. He knows, of course, that what he is doing I can do in London, and he may have a faint expectation that I shall be able to accomplish something."

"It would be useless to cable again?"

"Quite useless; message does not reach him none will."

As he was speaking a boy entered the room with a telegram in his hand. Its contents were short and to the point.

"Cablegram received. Kenyon."

"Well, that's all right," said Wentworth. "Now I shall cable that we have the money and tell him to identify himself at the bank, that there will be no formalities about the drawing of it to detain him." Saying this, Wentworth pulled the telegram forms toward him, and after considerable labor managed to concoct a dispatch that seemed to satisfy him.

"Don't spare money on it," said the young lady. "Be sure and make it plain to him."

"I think that will do; don't you?"

"Yes," she answered, after reading the dispatch. "That will do."

"Now," she said, "here is the check. I will wait here while you do all that is necessary to cable the money, or had I better go to the bank again to see if everything is all right?"

"If you don't mind, just sit where you are. You may look the door, if you like and you will not be disturbed."

It was some time before Wentworth returned, but his face was radiant. "We have done everything we can," he said. "The money is at his order there, if the cablegram gets over before twelve o'clock to-morrow, as I think it will."

"Very well, then, good-by," said the girl, holding out her hand with a smile. "I am Mistress of the Mine, Mr. Wentworth!"

CHAPTER XXIV.

If any man more miserable and dejected than John Kenyon lived in the broad Dominion of Canada he was, indeed, a person to be pitied. After having sent his cablegram to Wentworth he went to his very cheerless hotel, and next morning when he woke up he knew that Wentworth would have received that message, but that the chances were ten thousand to one that he could not get the money in time, even if he could get it at all. Still he resolved to stay in Ottawa, much as he detested the place, until the hour of option expired. Then, he thought, he would look around among the mines, and see if he could not get something to do in the management of one of them. This would enable him to make some money and to help pay off the indebtedness which he and Wentworth would owe in London as a result of their disastrous speculation. He felt so depressed that he did what most other Englishmen would have done in his place; he took a long walk. He went out on the bridge over the Ottawa river and gazed for a little while at the Chaudiere falls, with the mist rising from the chasm into which the waters plunged. Then he walked along the other side of the river among the big sawmills and huge interminable piles of lumber, with their grateful piney smell. By and by he found himself in the country, and then the forest closed in upon the bad road on which he walked. Nevertheless he kept on and on, without much thought of where he was going. Here and there he saw clearings in the woods, and a log shanty, or perhaps a barn. The result of all this was that, being a healthy man, he soon developed an enormous appetite, which forced itself upon his attention in spite of his depression. He noticed the evening was closing around him, and so was glad to come to a farmhouse that looked better than the ordinary shanty he had left behind. He asked for food, and soon sat down to a plentiful meal, the coarseness of which was more than compensated for by the excellence of his appetite. After dinner he began to realize how tired he was, and felt astonished to learn from his host how far he was from Ottawa.

"You can't get there to-night," said the farmer; "it is no use your trying. You stay with us to-night, and I'll take you in to-morrow. I'm going there in the forenoon." And so Kenyon remained all night, and slept the dreamless sleep of health and exhaustion.

It was somewhat late in the afternoon when he reached the city of Ottawa. Going toward his hotel he was astonished to hear his name shouted after him. Turning round, he saw a man rushing toward him whom he did not recognize.

"Your name is Kenyon, isn't it?" asked the man, somewhat out of breath.

"Yes, that is my name."

"I guess you don't remember me. I am the telegraph operator. We have had a dispatch waiting for you for some time, a cablegram from London. We have searched all over the town for you, but couldn't find you."

"Ah," said Kenyon, "is it important?"

"Well, that I don't know. You had better come with me to the office and get it. Of course, they don't generally cable unimportant things. I remember it said something about you keeping yourself in readiness for something."

They walked together to the telegraph office. The boy was still searching for Kenyon with the original dispatch, left the operator turned up the file and read it to him.

"You see it wants an answer," he said; "that's why I thought it was important to get you. You will have plenty of time for an answer to-night."

John took a lead pencil and wrote the cable dispatch which Wentworth received. He paid his money and said: "I will go to my hotel: It is the —— house. I will wait there, and if anything comes for me send it over as soon as possible."

"All right," said the operator; "that is the best plan; then we will know exactly where to find you. Of course, there is no use in your waiting here, because we can get you in five minutes. Perhaps it would be better to the hotel-for you if anything comes."

"Very well," said Kenyon. "I will leave it all in your hands."

Whether it was the effect of having been in the country or not, John felt that, somehow, the cablegram he had received was a good omen. He meditated over the ill luck he had suffered in the whole business from beginning to end, and thought of old Mr. Longworth's favorite phrase: "There's no such thing as luck."

Then came a rap at his door, and the bellboy said: "There is a gentleman here wishes to speak to you."

"Tell him to come up," was the answer, and, two minutes later, Von Brent entered.

"Any news?" he asked.

John, who was in a state of mind which made him suspicious of everything and everybody, answered: "No, nothing fresh."

"I am sorry for that. I had some hopes that perhaps you might be able to raise the money before 12 o'clock to-morrow. Of course, you know the option ends at noon to-morrow?"

"Yes, I know that."

"Did you know that Longworth was in town?"

"No," said Kenyon, "I have been out of town myself."

"Yes, he came last night. He has the money in the bank, as I told you. Now I will not accept it until the very latest moment. Of course, legally, I cannot accept it before that time, and just as legally I cannot refuse it after that, if he tenders it. I am very sorry all this has happened, more sorry than I can tell you. I hope you will not think that I am to blame in the matter."

"No, you are not in the slightest to blame. There is nobody to blame except myself. I feel that I have been culpably negligent and altogether too trustful."

"I wish to goodness I knew where you could get the money, but, of course, if I knew that I would have had it myself long ago."

"I am very much obliged to you," said Kenyon, "but the only thing you can do for me is to see that your clock can do for me is to see that your clock keeps back of time to-morrow. I may perhaps be up at the office before 12 o'clock—that is where I shall find you, I suppose?"

"Yes, I shall be there all the forenoon."

"Very good. I am much obliged to you. Von Brent, for your sympathy. I assure you I haven't many friends, and I am obliged to you, that's all. An Englishman, you know, is not very profuse in the matter of thanks, but I mean it."

"I'm sure you do," said Von Brent, "and I only sorry that my ass stance cannot be something substantial. Well, good-by, hoping to see you to-morrow."

After he had departed, Kenyon's impatience increased as the hours went on. He left the hotel and went direct to the telegraph office, but nothing had come for him.

"I'm afraid," said the operator, "that there won't be anything more to-night. If it should come late, shall I send it to your hotel?"

"Certainly, no matter at what hour it comes. I wish you would let me have it as soon as possible. It is very important."

Leaving the office, he went up the street, and, passing the principal hotel in the place, saw young Longworth, as dapper and correct in costume as ever, his singer eyes, against the admiration of Ottawa, for there was not another like it in the city, standing under the portico of the hotel.

"How do you do, Kenyon?" said that young man.

"My dear sir," said Kenyon, "the last time you spoke to me you said you desired to have nothing more to say to me. I cordially reciprocated that sentiment, and I want to have nothing to say to you."

"My dear fellow," cried young Mr. Longworth jauntily, "there is no harm done. Of course, in New York I was a little out of sorts. Everybody is in New York—beastly hole. I don't think it is worse than Ottawa, but the air is purer that by the way, perhaps you and I can make a little arrangement. I am going to buy that mine to-morrow, as doubtless you know. Now I should like to see it in the hands of a good and competent manager. If a couple of hundred pounds a year would be any temptation to you, I think we can afford to let you develop the mine."

"Thank you," said Kenyon.

"I knew you would be grateful; just think over the matter, will you, and don't come to any rash decision. We can probably give a little more than that, but until we see how the mine is turning out, it is not likely we shall spend a great deal of money on it."

"Of course," said John, "the proper answer to your remark would be to knock you down, but, besides being a law-abiding citizen, I have no desire to get into jail to-night for doing it, because, besides the chastisement I should send, Mr. Longworth, that I may have some business to do with that mine myself before 12 o'clock to-morrow."

"Ah, it is my turn to be grateful now," said Mr. Longworth. "In a rough-and-tumble fight I am sure you would master me easier than you would do in a contest of diplomacy."

"Do you call it diplomacy? You rebel. I suppose, to your action in relation to the mine. I call it robbery."

"Oh, do you? Well, that is the kind of conversation which leads to breaches of the peace, and as I, also, am a law-abiding citizen, I will not continue the discussion any further. I bid you a very good evening, Mr. Kenyon," saying which the young man turned into the hotel. John walked to his own much more modest inn and retired for the night. He did not sleep well. All night long phantom telegraph messengers were tapping at the door, and he started up every now and then to receive cablegrams which faded away as he awoke. Shortly after breakfast he went to the telegraph office, but found that nothing had arrived for him.

"I am afraid," said the operator, "that nothing will arrive before noon."

"Before noon!" echoed John. "Why?"

"The wires are down in some places in the east, and messages are delayed a good deal. Perhaps you noticed the lack of eastern news in the morning papers. Very little news came from the east last night." Seeing John's look of anxious interest, the operator continued: "Does the dispatch you expect pertain to money matters?"

"Yes, it does."

"Do they know you at the bank?"

"No, I don't think they do."

"Then if I were you I would go up to the bank to be identified, so that, if it is a matter of minutes, no unnecessary time may be lost. You had better tell them that you expect a money order by telegram, and, although such orders are paid without any identification at the bank, yet they take every precaution to see that it does not get into the hands of the wrong man."

"Thank you," said Kenyon, "I am much obliged to you for your suggestion. I will act upon it." And as soon as the bank opened John Kenyon presented himself to the cashier.

"I am expecting a large amount of money from England to-day. It is very important that, when it arrives, there shall be no delay in having it placed at my disposal. I want to know if there are any formalities to be gone through?"

"Where is the money coming from?" said the clerk.

"It is coming from England."

"Is there anyone in Ottawa who can identify you?"

"Yes, I know the telegraph operator here."

"Ah," said the cashier, somewhat doubtfully, "anybody else?"

"Mr. Von Brent knows me very well."

"That will do. Suppose you get Mr Von Brent to come here and identify you as the man who bears the name of Kenyon. Then the moment your cablegram comes the money will be at your disposal."

Kenyon hurried to Von Brent's rooms and found him alone. "Will you come down to the bank and identify me as Kenyon?"

"Certainly. Has the money arrived?"

"No, it has not, but I expect it, and want to provide for every contingency I do not wish to have any delay in my identification when it does come."

"If it comes by cable," said Von Brent, "there will be no need of identification. The bank is not responsible, you know. They take the money entirely at the sender's risk. They might pay it to the telegraph operator who receives the message; I believe they would not be held liable. However, it is better to see that nothing is left undone."

Going over to the bank Von Brent said to the cashier: "This is John Kenyon."

"Very good," replied the cashier. "Have you been at the telegraph office lately, Mr. Kenyon?"

"No, I have not; at least not for half an hour or so."

"Well, I would go there as soon as possible, if I were you."

"That means," said Von Brent, as soon as they had reached the door, "that they have had their notice about the money. I believe it is already in the bank for you. I will go back to my rooms and not leave them till you come."

John hurried to the telegraph office. "Anything for me yet?" he said.

"Nothing as yet, Mr. Kenyon, I think, however," he added, with a smile, "that it will be all right. I hope so."

The moments ticked along with their usual rapidity, yet it seemed to Kenyon the clock was going fearfully fast. Eleven o'clock came and found him still pacing up and down the office of the telegraph. The operator offered him the hospitality of the private room, but this he declined. Every time the machine clicked John's ears were on the alert trying to catch a meaning from the instrument.

Ten minutes after 11.

Twenty minutes after 11, and still no dispatch. The cold perspiration stood on John's brow and he groaned aloud.

"I suppose it is very important," said the operator.

"Very important."

"Well, now, I shouldn't say so, but I know the money is in the bank for you. Perhaps if you went up there and demanded it they would give it to you."

It was 25 minutes past the hour when John hurried up toward the bank. "I have every belief," he said to the cashier, "that the money is here for me now. Is it possible for me to get it?"

"Have you the cablegram?"

"No, I have not."

"Well, you see, we cannot pay the money until we see the cablegram to the person for whom it is intended. If time is of importance, you should not leave the telegraph office, and the moment you get your message come here; then there will be no delay whatever. Do you wish to draw all the money at once?"

"I don't know how much there is, but I must have £20,000."

"Very well, to save time, you had better make out a check for £20,000—that will be—" and here he gave the number of dollars at the rate of the day on the pound. "Just make out a check for that amount and I will certify it. A certified check is as good as gold. The moment you get your message I will hand you the certified check."

John wrote out the order and handed it to the cashier, glancing at the clock as he did so. It was now 25 minutes of 12. He rushed to the telegraph office with all the speed of which he was capable, but met only a blank look from the chief operator.

"It has not come yet," he said, shaking his head.

Gradually despair began to descend on the waiting man. It was worse to miss everything now than never to have had the hope of success. It was like hanging a man who had once been reprieved. He resumed his nervous pace up and down the corridor of Outside. A quarter of twelve. He heard the chimes ring somewhere. If the message did not come before they rang again, it would be forever too late.

Fourteen minutes—13 minutes—12 minutes—11 minutes—10 minutes to 12 and yet no—

"Here you are!" shouted the operator in great glee. "She's a-coming, it's all right, John Kenyon, Ottawa." Then he wrote as rapidly as the machine clicked out the message. "There it is, now rush!"

John needed no telling to rush. People had begun to notice him as the man who was doing nothing but running between the bank and the telegraph office.

It was seven minutes to twelve when he got to the bank.

"Is that dispatch right?" he said, shoving it through the arched aperture. The clerk looked at it with provoking composure, and then compared it with some papers.

"For God's sake hurry!" pleaded John.

"You have plenty of time," said the cashier; coolly, looking up at the clock and going on with his examination.

"Yes," he added, "that is all right. Here is your certified check."

John clasped it, and bolted out of the bank, as a burglar might have done. It was five minutes to twelve when he got to the steps that led to the rooms of Mr. Von Brent. Now all his excitement seemed to have deserted him. He was as cool and calm as if he had five days instead of as many minutes in which to make the payment. He mounted the steps quietly, walked along the passage, and knocked at the door of Von Brent's room.

"Come in," was the shout that greeted him.

He opened the door, glancing at the clock behind Von Brent's head as he did so.

It stood three minutes to twelve.

Young Mr. Longworth was sitting there, with just a touch of pallor on his countenance, and there seemed an ominous glitter in his eye-glass. He said nothing, and John Kenyon completely ignored his presence.

"There is still some life left in my option, I believe?" he said to Von Brent, after nodding good day to him.

"Very little, but perhaps it will serve. You have two and a half minutes," said Von Brent.

"Are the papers ready?" inquired John.

"All ready, everything except putting in the names."

"Very well, here is the money." Von Brent looked at the certified check. "That is perfectly right," he said. "The mine is yours." Then he rose and stretched his hand across the table to Kenyon, who grasped it cordially.

Young Mr. Longworth also rose, and said, languidly: "As this seems to be a meeting of long lost brothers, I shall now leave. Good-by, Mr. Von Brent."

And with that the young man adjusted his eyeglass and took his departure.

CHAPTER XXV.

When Edith Longworth entered the office of George Wentworth, that young gentleman somewhat surprised her. He sprang from his chair the moment she entered the room, rushed out of the door, and shrieked at the top of his voice for a boy. No one answered him; whereupon Wentworth returned to the room, apparently in his right mind. "I beg your pardon, Miss Longworth," he said, laughing; "the fact was, I had just sent my boy with a telegram to you, and now, you see, I have saved sixpence."

"Then you have heard from Canada?" said the young lady.

"Yes, a message, but to the point." He handed her the cablegram, and she read: "Mine purchased; shall take charge temporarily."

"Then the money got there in time," she said, handing him back the telegraphic message.

"Oh, yes," said George, with the easy confidence of a man who doesn't at all know what he is talking about. "We had plenty of time. I knew it would get there all right. Good!"

"I am glad of that; I was afraid, perhaps, we might have sent it too late. One can never tell what delays or formalities there may be."

"Oh, no, there was no trouble. And now, Miss Longworth, what are your commands? Am I to be your agent here in Great Britain?"

"Have you written to Mr. Kenyon?"

"Yes, I wrote him just after I sent the cable message."

"Of course you didn't—"

"No. I didn't say a word that would lead him to suspect who was the mistress of the mine. In my zeal I even went so far as to sign my name. You are hereafter to be known in the correspondence as Mr. Smith, the owner of the mine."

Miss Longworth laughed.

"And, oh, by the way," cried Wentworth, "here is a barrel belonging to you."

"A barrel!" she said, and, looking in the direction to which he pointed, she saw in a corner of the room a barrel with the inscription, "If it belongs to me," continued the young woman, "who has taken the liberty of opening it?"

"Oh, I did that as your agent. The barrel contains the mineral from the mine which is worth a million. Valuable. It started from Canada over three months ago, and only arrived here the other day. It seems that the idiot who sent it addressed it in some way by New York, and it was held by some jack in office belonging to the United States customs. We have had more diplomatic correspondence and trouble about that barrel than you can imagine. It was detained, and had to be hind the fair, when it is really no use."

Miss Longworth rose and went to the barrel. She picked out some of the beautiful white specimens that were in it.

"Is this the mineral?" she asked.

Wentworth laughed. "Think of a person buying a mine at an exorbitant price and not knowing what it produces! Yes, that is the mineral."

"This is not mica, of course?"

"No, it is not mica. That is the stuff used for the making of china."

"It looks as if it would take a good polish. Will it, do you know?"

"I do not know. I could easily find out for you."

"I wish you would, and get a piece of it polished, which I will use as a paper weight."

"What are your orders for the rest of the barrel?"

"What were you thinking of doing with it?" said the young woman.

"Well, I was thinking the best plan would be to send some of it to each of the pottery works in this country, and get their orders for more of the stuff, if they want to use it."

"I think it is a very good idea. I understand from the cablegram that Mr. Kenyon says he will take charge of the mine in a temporary way."

"Yes, I imagine he left Ottawa at once, as soon as he had concluded his bargain. Of course, we shall not know for certain until he writes."

"Very well, then; it seems to me that the best thing you could do over here would be to get what orders can be obtained in England for the mineral. Then I suppose you could write to Mr. Kenyon, and ask him to get a proper person to operate the mine."

"Yes, I will do that."

"When he comes over here you and he can have a consultation as to the best thing to be done after that. I expect nothing very definite can be done until he comes. You may make whatever excuse you can for the absence of this mythical Mr. Smith, and say that you act for him. Then you may tell Mr. Kenyon, in whatever manner you choose, that Mr. Smith intends both you and Mr. Kenyon to share conjointly with him. I think you will have no trouble in making John—that is—in making Mr. Kenyon believe there is such a person as Mr. Smith, if you put it strongly enough to him. Make him understand that Mr. Smith would never have heard of the mine unless Mr. Kenyon and you had discovered it, and that he is very glad indeed to have such a good opportunity of investing his money, so that, naturally, he wishes those who have been instrumental in helping him to this investment to share in its profit. I think you could make all this clear enough, so that your friend will suspect nothing. Don't you think so?"

"Well, with any other man than John Kenyon I should have my doubts, because as a fabricator I don't think I have a very high reputation, but with John I have no fears whatever. He will believe everything I say. He trusts a man, but it's so very much for his own good that I shall have no hesitation in doing it."

"Then you will write to him about getting a fit and proper person to manage the mine?"

"Yes. I don't think there will be any necessity for doing so, but I will make sure. I imagine John will not leave there until he sees everything to his satisfaction. He will be very anxious indeed for the mine to prove as great a success as he believes it will be, even though at present he does not know that he is to have any pecuniary interest in its prosperity."

"Very well, then, I will bid you good-by. I may not be here again, but whenever you hear from Mr. Kenyon I shall be very glad if you will let me know."

"Certainly. I will let you know everything that happens. I will send you all the documents in the case, as you once remarked. You always like to see the original papers, don't you?"

"Yes, I suppose I do." Miss Longworth lingered a moment at the door, then, looking straight at Wentworth, she said to him:

"You remember you spoke rather bitterly to my father the other day?"

"Yes," said Wentworth, coloring, "I remember it."

"You are a young man; he is old, besides, I think you were entirely in the wrong. He had nothing whatever to do with what his nephew had done."

"Oh, I know that," said Wentworth. "I would have apologized to him long ago—only—well, you know, he told me I shouldn't be allowed in the office again, and I don't suppose I should."

"A letter from you would be allowed in the office," replied the young lady, looking at the floor.

"Of course it would," said George, "I will write to him at once and apologize."

"It is very good of you," said Edith, holding out her hand to him, and the next moment she was gone.

George Wentworth turned to his desk and wrote a letter of apology. There is no need to linger upon the strange, incomprehensible nature of women. "She makes me apologize to him, and quite right, too, but if he hadn't been for the row with her father, she never would have heard about the transaction. And therefore could not have bought the mine, which she was anxious to do for Kenyon's sake—lucky beggar. John is, after all!"

CHAPTER XXVI.

After the business of transferring the mine to Mr. Kenyon was completed, John Kenyon went to the telegraph office and sent a short cable message to Wentworth. Then he turned his steps to the hotel, an utterly exhausted man. The excitement of the session of the last few days was too much for him, and he felt that, if he did not get out of the city of Ottawa and into the country, where there were fewer people and more air, he was going to be ill. He resolved to leave for the mine as soon as possible. There he would get things in as good order as possible and keep things going until he heard from the owner. When he got to his hotel he wrote to Wentworth, telling him the arrangement under which he secured the mine, rather briefly, and dealing with other more personal matters. Having posted this, he began to pack his portmanteau preparatory to leaving early next morning. While thus occupied the bell boy came to his room and said: "There is a gentleman wishes to see you."

He imagined at once that it was Von Brent, who wished to see him with regard to the formality relating to the transfer, and he was, therefore, very much astonished, in fact, for a moment speechless, to see Mr. William Longworth enter and calmly gaze round the gather shabby room with his critical eyeglass.

"Ah," he said, "these are your diggings, are they? This is what they call a dollar hotel, I suppose, over here. Well, some people may like it, but I confess I don't care much about it myself. Their three or four-dollar-a-day hotels are bad enough for me. By the way, you look rather surprised to see me. Being strangers together in a strange country, I expected a warmer greeting. You said last night, in front of the Russell house, that it would please you very much to give me a warm greeting; perhaps you would like to do so to-night."

"Have you come up here to provoke a quarrel with me?" asked Kenyon.

"Oh, bless you, no. Quarrell Nothing of the sort. What would I want to quarrel about?"

"Perhaps you will be good enough to tell me why you came here, then?"

"Very reasonable request, very reasonable indeed, and perfectly natural, but still quite unnecessary. It is not likely that a man would climb up here into your room, and then not be prepared to tell you why he came, in the first place, to congratulate you on the beautiful and dramatic way in which you secured the mine at the last moment, or apparently at the last moment. I suppose you had the money all along?"

"It's very good of you," said Edith.

"No, I had not."

"Then you came in to Von Brent just as soon as you received it?"

"Well, now, I don't see that it is the business of anyone else but myself. Still, if you want to know, I have no objection to saying that I went to Mr. Von Brent's room at the moment I received the money."

"Really! Then it was sent over by cable, I presume?"

"Your presumption is entirely correct."

"My dear Kenyon," said the young man, seating himself without being asked, and gazing at John in a benevolent kind of way, "you really show some little temper over this affair of ours. Now here is the whole thing in a nutshell—"

"My dear sir, I don't wish to hear the whole thing in a nutshell. I know all about it. All I wish to know—"

"Ah, precisely, of course you do, certainly, but nevertheless let me have my say. Here is the whole thing. I tried to—well, to cheat you. I thought I could make a little money by doing so, and my scheme failed. Now if anybody should be in a bad temper, it is I, not you. Don't you see that? You are not acting your part well at all. I'm astonished at you!"

"Mr. Longworth, I wish to have nothing whatever to say to you. If you have anything to ask, I wish you would ask it as quickly as possible, and then leave me alone."

"The chief fault I find with you, Kenyon," said Longworth, throwing one leg over the other, and clasping his hands around his knee, "the chief fault I have to find, is your painful lack of a sense of humor. Now, you remember last night I offered you the managership of the mine. I thought certainly that by this time to-day I should be the owner of it, or, at least, one of the owners. Now, you don't appear to appreciate my funniness in the situation. Here you are, the owner of the mine, and I am out in the cold—left," as they say here in America. I am the man who is left—"

"If that is all you have to talk about," said Kenyon gravely, "I must ask you to allow me to go on with my packing. I am going to the mine to-morrow."

"Certainly, my dear fellow, pack at once, and I will send me. Can I be of any assistance to you?" I requires a special g[illegible] portmanteau[illegible] wanted t[illegible] be—O[illegible] a hun[illegible] could [illegible] who s[illegible] fee, al[illegible] on a t[illegible] the gate [illegible] in whi[illegible] no a[illegible] on him.

"I am as ungracious, but nevertheless I will continue. It is better, I see, to be honest with you, if a person wants to get anything out of you. Now I want to get a bit of information out of you. I want to know where you got the money with which you bought the mine?"

"I got it from the bank."

"Ah, yes, but I want to know who sent it over to you."

"It was sent to me by George Wentworth."

"Quite so, but now I want to know who gave Wentworth the money?"

"You will have a chance of finding that out when you go to England by asking him."

"Then you won't tell me?"

"I can't tell you."

"You mean by that, of course, that you won't."

"I always mean, Mr. Longworth, exactly what I say. I mean that I can't tell you. I don't know myself."

"Really?"

"Yes, really. You seem to have some difficulty in believing that anybody can speak the truth."

"Well, that's a common vice—speaking the truth. You must forgive a little surprise." He nursed his knee for a moment, and looked meditatively up at the ceiling. "Now would you like to know who furnished that money?"

"I have no curiosity in the matter whatever."

"Have you not? Well, you are a singular man. It seems to me that a person into whose lap £20,000 drops from the skies would have some little curiosity to know from whom the money came."

"I haven't the slightest."

"Nevertheless, I will tell you who gave the money to Wentworth. It was my dear friend Melville. I didn't tell you in New York, of course, that Melville and I had a little quarrel about this matter, and he went home decidedly huffy. I had no idea he would take this method of revenge, but I see it quite clearly now. He knew I had received the option of the mine. There was a little trouble as to what each of our respective shares was to be, and I thought, as I had secured the option I did not think it right to decide alone. He thought differently. He was going to Von Brent to explain the whole matter, but I pointed out to him that such a course would do no good, the option being legally made out in my name, so that the moment your claim expired, mine began. When this dawned upon him, he took the steamer and went to England. I suppose he left his friend in this finish to the affair. It was a pretty sharp trick of Melville's, and I give him credit for it. He is a very much shrewder and cleverer man than I thought."

"It seems to me, Mr. Longworth, that your inordinate conceit makes you always underestimate your friends, or your enemies, either, for that matter."

"There is something in that, Kenyon; I think you are more than half right, but I thought, perhaps, I could make it advantageous to you to do me a favor in this matter. I thought you might have no objection to writing a little document to the effect that the money did not come in time, and consequently I had secured the mine. Then, if you would sign that, I could take it over to Melville and make terms with him. Of course, if he knows that he has a hold on me, there will be much chance of coming to any arrangement with him."

"You can make no arrangements with me, Mr. Longworth, that involve a sacrifice of the truth."

"Ah, well, I suspected as much, but I thought it was worth while to try. However, my dear sir, I may make terms with Melville yet, and then I imagine you won't have much to do with the mine."

"I shall not have anything to do with it if you and Melville have a share in it. And if, as you suspect, Melville has the money, I am afraid it is a bad way. My opinion is that when one rascal gets an advantage over another rascal, the other rascal will be, as you say, 'left.'"

Longworth mused over this for a moment and said: "Yes, I fear you are right—in fact, I am certain of it. Well, that is all I wanted to know. I will bid you good-by. I shan't see you again in Ottawa, as I shall sail very shortly for England. Have you any messages you would like given to your friends over there?"

"None, thank you."

"Well, ta, ta," and the young man left John to his packing.

When that necessary operation was concluded Kenyon sat down and thought over what young Longworth had told him. His triumph, after all, had been somewhat dashed. The battle between the two scoundrels was so small that he felt he didn't care which of them owned the mine. Meditating upon this disagreeable subject, he suddenly remembered a request he had made to Wentworth to make to the new owner of the mine. He wanted no favor from Melville, so he wrote a second letter contradicting the request made in the first, and, after posting it, returned to his hotel and went to bed, probably the most tired man in the city of Ottawa.

CHAPTER XXVII.

This chapter consists largely of letters. As a general thing letters are of little concern to anyone except the writers and the receivers, but they are inserted here under the hope that the reader is already well enough acquainted with the correspondents to feel some interest in what they have written about. What with husbands, wives and children, mothers and daughters, most considered, and in almost every case it must be owned that the preponderance of dead and wounded lay with the papas. "Already two of our sons are gone," sobbed an Irish lawndress, "and what have we got to show for it?"

"Two killed outright," cried Mrs. Foster, "and one of them our Rafferty, and now where is Leon?"

Alas! who could say? Leaving Raymond, his weeping women and angering men, let us spur on after Turner and the sorrel troop, by this time nearly half way to the Sandy. Even on the march it was noted that some of the fact, therefore please disregard the request I made as to employment in the telegraph office, and I am conscious of a certain sense of disappointment in the fact that Melville has the money, because it seems I have only kept one rascal from buying it, to put it in the hands of another rascal. Is that logical, Kenyon?"

"Melville the owner!" cried Wentworth to himself. "Whatever could have put that into John's head? This letter is evidently the one posted a few hours before, as I have received no other request he has tomake." And, without delay, George Wentworth tore open the envelope of the second letter which she was obviously the one written first. It contained a number of documents relating to the transfer of the mine. The letter from John himself went on to give particulars of the buying of the mine. Then it continued. "I wish you would do me a favor, George. Will you kindly ask the owner of the mine if he will give me charge of it? I am, of course, anxious to make it turn out as well as possible, and I believe I can more than earn my salary, whatever it is. You know I am not grasping in the matter of money, and as large a salary as you think I deserve.

"I desire to make money for reasons that are not entirely selfish, as you know. To tell you the truth, George, I am sick of the world of people. I want to live here in the woods, where there is not so much deceit and treachery as there seems to be in the big towns. When I reached London last time I felt like a boy getting home. My feelings have undergone a complete change, and I think, if it were not for you and a certain young lady, I should never care to see the big city again. What is the use of my affecting mystery and writing the words 'a certain young lady,' when you know perfectly well I mean—Miss Edith Longworth. You know also that I am, and have long been, in love with her. If I had succeeded in making the money I thought I should by selling the mine, I might have had some hopes of her love, and of ultimately being in a position to ask her to be my wife. But that, and very many other hopes, have disap-

WE WEEP NOT.

Even in philosophic New Jersey you will find newspaper proprietors who fly into rage when one of their rivals say something unkind or unfair about them. To such persons is commending the attitude of A. L. Force, of the Plainfield Press. Mr. Force has been the object of many severe attacks by the Plainfield News, but he does not tear his hair or sit down and weep. Instead he merely asks that Brother Runyon shall substitute the scalping-knife for the tomahawk. Hearken to his appeal:

If Editor Runyon is perverse in his intention to make us a daily feature of his personal remarks, he said, and it is not often that we ask favors of him, and if he has one whit of magnanimity in his character he will grant it, that he will write with more elegance and more humor about our faults and errors which are to be but human. We don't mind the roasting, but we do hate this butchery.

After that we should expect that Mr. Runyon will never refer to Mr. Force in anything less elegant than blank verse. If he must needs say hard things once in a while, let him use quotations from Emerson, Oliver Wendell Holmes and Ruskin.—New York Tribune

ABOUT SEWAGE BEDS.

The following from the Evening Post concerning sewage beds at Worcester, which were inspected by Plainfield citizens before the present system of disposal was adopted here, is interesting:

Worcester, Mass., whose experiments in the disposal of sewage have had frequent mention in the discussion of the subject of sewerage for inland cities, is to be compelled by a court decision to make some changes in its methods. As is known, much of the sewage of that city of 100,000 inhabitants is treated by the expensive process of chemical precipitation, the theory being that the fluids allowed to flow into the river after this process are innocuous. The people of the town of the Blackstone River, and residents along that stream assert that the river is still prejudicial to their health and comfort because of the sewage. A judicial inquiry declares that the trouble is due partly to the nature of the treated sewage, which is turned back into the stream, and partly to the fact that some portion of the city sewage still flows into the river without being treated. The city is directed diligently to seek a remedy and to report three months hence what it has done. One important change contemplated is the separation of the surface drainage from the sewage, thus rendering easier the treatment of the latter. Waterbury and other inland cities of Connecticut, which also have a sewerage problem, are watching Worcester's efforts to solve it. The Waterbury board of estate commissioners to consider the subject is taking shape in the draft of a bill for presentation to the Legislature next month.

LET THE CITY PAY.

The sum of money which Councilman Fisk has appropriated from his own private bank account for the work of street improvement since the regular appropriation was exhausted, amounts to something like $939. As suggested by a prominent business man in a communication to this paper after the city election, the city should repay Mr. Fisk at the earliest possible moment. The city should not be under obligations of this kind from any of its citizens. It was a very clever thing for the Mayor-elect to do, this effort to keep the city streets looking presentable, but it is to be hoped that it will never happen again when well-to-do officials think it necessary to go down into their own pockets to pay for that for which they should only contribute their portion through the channel of taxation. It is not good government.

TURNING OVER A NEW LEAF.

What would a New Year be without the turning over of new leafs by erring humanity? It might lose some of its picturesqueness and traditional manner in, but still who think the world would be just as well off. The new year pledges are, in most cases, made only to be broken at the slightest temptation—poor, weak souls that we are. Still there are some who are stern in their purposes not to indulge in this or that excess, after the mind has been made up that no good comes from much indulgences, and we may congratulate these few that the unwritten law of new Year's time incurs them the yearning to eliminate the damaging things from their being.

VICISSITUDES OF LECTURING.

It has been demonstrated time and again that men who gain great personal renown in politics cannot succeed on the lecture platform at high salaries, and the failure of William J. Bryan is not any more marked than would be a like career of any other man in a similar position Even the best lecturers on the public platform value their services hundreds of dollars less per lecture than the offer made Mr. Bryan by a syndicate on the spur of the moment. Where some men make signal success in some lines of life the lyceum proves a missing link to an otherwise chain of success.

Every Plainfielder will find the proceedings of the Common Council, Monday, of more than ordinary interest Figures may be dry reading, but they're the things that catch the eye of the taxpayer every time.

LAST CHAPEL SERVICE.

BUT A FEW DAYS REMAIN OF MONROE AVENUE CHAPEL.

James McGee, the Father of the Chapel, Reviews the Work in Retrospect—To Become a Church on New Year's.

A service of more than usual interest was held at Monroe Avenue chapel Sunday, and the attendance was large. There was not special music but James McGee gave a retrospect, which was very appropriate in connection with the last days of the chapel.

Mr. McGee has for several years been closely identified with the work at the chapel and is well fitted to give a sketch of the chapel's history.

It was about seventeen years ago that Mission was started at the corner of West Front street and Clinton avenue by Mrs. Hall, Mrs. Crane, Mr. Cortell and several others. Owing to certain conditions it was with difficulty that work was continued. However, good work was accomplished. About five years ago, when those in charge were about to give up the mission, the sympathies of Mr. McGee and other members of the First M. E. church were enlisted and the work was taken up with renewed vigor and earnestness.

Very soon afterward property was purchased on Monroe avenue and a chapel was erected. It was then that the work progressed. Rev. Mr. Munson, a student, was called to look after the work temporarily and later Rev. W. C. O'Donnell was called. The latter was really the first pastor. As time went on the membership increased and it was found necessary to erect the building, which now adjoins the chapel, which is known as Epworth House. At present the chapel membership is about 100 and the Sunday-school membership is over 200. All branches of the work are well organized and when the chapel becomes a church next Thursday night it will start out with great promise.

Following Mr. McGee's remarks, Rev. W. C. O'Donnell made a few remarks, which were a fitting close to the service.

ALL VERY FINE.

To give proper credit to all the handsome Christmas exchanges that Uncle Sam's postal service has brought to the desks of these editorial rooms would exhaust pretty near all the adjectives that the English language possesses and take up many lines of printing space. The best that can be said, however, is that they were all fine examples of typographical art.

A PRACTICAL ACTION.

The fact of the Public Library officers establishing distributing points at convenient locations for those who desire to take advantage of the resources of that institution, as explained in another column, shows an active and sincere desire on their part to make the library something more than a mere creditable acquisition to the city; it evinces an intention to have it fulfill the functions for which it was endowed in a practical way.

A JUST LAW

Under the present postal law a fee is charged for registered mail matter, but when packages are lost Uncle Sam does not make good the loss. This is certainly unjust and the House of Representatives has just passed a bill providing that in case of loss damages shall be paid not to exceed $10, unless the value of the package is less in which case only the value shall be paid.

The indications are that Senator John P. Jones, who left the Republican ranks and became a Populist recently, will have to fight for his return to the United State Senate from Nevada.

PRACTICE MAKES PERFECT.

Better commence practicing 1897 now. Then you won't write it 1896 so many times a week from today.

The after-election confidence that Chicago banks seem to enjoy is of the misplaced kind.

Garret Preston Smith, the painter who fell from the scaffold in the City Hotel last Thuesday afternoon, passed away at his home, 676 West Third street, at one o'clock Tuesday. Nearly Upset the Sleigh.

A number of young people coasting Tuesday on the Watchung avenue hill, near Belvidere avenue, frightened a horse being driven by S. A. Cruikshank and it was only by the closest margin that a serious accident was averted, as the horse nearly upset the sleigh and at the same time came near running away.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE

A Red-Letter Year for 1897.

THE ENTIRE NOVELTY of many of the plans for 1897 is noticeable. For instance, the following series:

"LONDON AS SEEN BY CHARLES DANA GIBSON." Mr. Gibson has not before appeared as a writer. He visited London last summer for SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE for the purpose of depicting with pen and pencil those scenes and types which the busy metropolis presents in endless variety.

Of like novelty is the first considerable NOVEL by RICHARD HARDING DAVIS, "Soldiers of Fortune." The hero is one of the most vigorous men that Mr. Davis has drawn. Illustrated by C. D. Gibson.

"THE CONDUCT OF GREAT BUSINESSES." A beautifully illustrated series of articles of which the following are already completed:

"The Cotton Manufacture."
"The Management of a Great Hotel."
"The Workings of the Bank."
"A Great Manufactory."

"UNDERGRADUATE LIFE IN AMERICAN COLLEGES." A series of articles describing upon the life of our older universities as represented by the doings of the students themselves.

Judge Henry E. Howland writes on "Undergraduate Life at Yale."
Mr. James Alexander on "Princeton," and Herbert Gunst and Edward S. Martin on "Harvard."

"JAPAN AND CHINA SINCE THE WAR" will be a most interesting group of articles richly illustrated.

"THE UNQUIET SEX." Under the title of "The Unquiet Sex." Mrs. Helen Watterson Moody will write a series of articles on "Woman and Reform," "The College-Bred Woman," "Woman's Clubs," and "The Case of Maria" (a paper on domestic service).

W. D. HOWELLS'S "Story of a Play." In this Mr. Howells gives us the best novel he has ever produced in his delightful vein of light comedy.

GEORGE W. CABLE. In addition to the fiction mentioned there will be a series of four short stories by George W. Cable the only one he has written for many years.

HOW TO TRAVEL WISELY with a minimum of money and trouble must be explained in an art little understood. MR. LEWIS MORRIS HOSKINS is engaged to write and offer a variety of useful suggestions and ideas on OCEAN AND LAND TRAVEL. This will be happily rounded out by an article from RICHARD HARDING DAVIS on "TRAVELLERS WHO MEET." Their Ways and Methods. The illustrations by American and foreign artists will be highly pertinent.

 It is impossible in a small space to even mention the many attractive features for 1897. A beautiful illustrated book will be prepared, which will be sent, postage paid, on request.

UNDER A FLORAL BELL.

HARRY C. RUNYON AND LOUISA BAKER PLEDGED TOGETHER TO DWELL.

Hymen Completes the Scene for Which Cupid Prepared the Way—Ceremony Performed Amid a Host of Friends.

A pretty home wedding took place Monday when Miss Louisa Baker and Harry Chase Runyon, one of Plainfield's young lawyers, were united in marriage at the home of the bride in the Crescent flats on Watchung avenue.

The rooms were artistically decorated for the occasion with evergreens, roses, carnations and smilax. A floral bell, which was made of evergreen and was lined with carnations and roses, was hung in the centre of the parlor and under it the ceremony was performed by Rev J. Kennedy Newell. The bridal party marched in through the sitting room to the Lohengrin wedding march, played on the piano by Miss Ida E. Dunham. The ushers, Robert M. Clark and Francis J. Blatz, led the party and then came the bridesmaid, Miss Minnie L. Stiglitz, gowned in white organdie over blue silk, and carrying a bouquet of white carnations, and the best man, Charles J. McNabb. The bride and groom followed to the wedding bell under which the ceremony was performed.

The bride was gowned in white brocaded silk and carried a bouquet of white roses.

After congratulations, an elaborate collation was served. Then the couple were escorted to a coach decorated for the occasion with white streamers by friends of the couple. The left on the 2:32 train for New York, from where they went this morning to Washington, D. C., to spend the rest of the week. Just as they were seated in the car, some of their friends, who had accompanied them to the train, showered them with rice to the amusement of the other passengers, who enjoyed the fun as well as the friends.

UPSET BY THE FENDER.

Ned Waring Did Not Get Out of the Way of a Car Soon Enough.

Donald Stuart and Ned Waring, both of Park avenue, had an adventure with a trolley car Mond y while on their way down town. It was about 9:30 o'clock and the boys had reached the corner of Park avenue and Fourth street. There was quite a number of people waiting for the car, which was in sight down the street, and the boys decided to stop the car. They stood in the middle of the track, and waited for the car. The car came and the motorman, seeing that the boys were joking, kept on. Stuart jumped out of the way just in time, but Waring was too late, for the fender struck his feet and knocked them out from under him. He was just about to sit down on the fender when Stuart, who had taken in the situation, made a grand effort, seized Waring by the coat tail and threw him into the gutter and away from in front of the car. Some of the spectators of the scene screamed when Waring started to fall, and all expected a serious ending to the little fun.

CONCERNING TAXATION.

INTERESTING REPORTS MADE TO THE COUNCIL LAST NIGHT

Councilman Frost Shows How Much Property is Taxed in Every Ward and What Each Shares of City Expenses.

There was an air of frigidity circulating about the City Council chamber Monday, and to an outsider the impression would be given that the members, with their overcoats on, were taking a sleighride. It was said that the coolness even affected Clerk MacMurray, for his vocal chords seemed to have lost that clear articulation for which they are noted. Councilman Moore was the only member absent.

Mr. Fisk moved that the sewer commissioners report be taken up, and in this connection he offered sworn statements from Editors A. L. Force and F. W. Runyon that the corporation notices regarding the report had been published as required.

An opportunity was given all present to state their objections to the sewer assessments made. Boice, Runyon & Co. objected to an assessment of $87.32, as their property is used as a lumber yard and the improvements are very little, also for the reason that the rear portion cannot be sewered because the sewer is too low for them to connect with at the lumber yards, and the same firm objected to an assessment of $69.85 on the Park avenue property formerly occupied by them as a lumber yard, for the same reasons as stated above, and in both cases they asked for a reduction.

Charles Burnett, of Madison avenue, objected to his assessment as compared with other nearby property, which was valued higher and assessed less.

V. Nolen, of Crescent avenue, was another objector, on the ground that he did not favor the form adopted by the commissioners upon which they made the assessments, and he did not think they had any right to withhold the knowledge concerning the method used by them.

Mrs. B. O. Bowers, who was assessed $61.60, objected, for the reason that there were no sewers on the Franklin place side of her property, and she asked for a reduction. After hearing all the objections, the council went into a committee of the whole and considered the same. It was admitted by nearly all of the objectors that the direct benefits received from the sewers was worth the amount assessed, and accordingly they were granted nothing by the Council. On the contrary they ratified and confirmed the report of the Commissioners and resolutions offered by Mr. Fisk to that effect were adopted.

Mr. Frost asked the Corporation Counsel if the Council had any right to ask the Sewer Commissioners upon what basis they assessed or to tell them how to make assessments. Mr. Marsh stated that he supposed the Council would have the right but it would be giving them extraordinary powers. The principal adopted was to determine how much special benefit was required to assess as each property might receive particular benefit. The cost of construction of the sewerge basin falls on the city at large. Mr. Marsh further stated that the general criticism seemed to be that the Commissioners had been too liberal with the taxpayers. It would be impossible to give exact justness to all in a city of 15,000 inhabitants, but if the taxpayer is benefited to the extent of the special benefits received the question is practically settled.

Mr. Frost thought that the people of Plainfield ought to congratulate themselves on securing sewers at such a low figure.

At this point the regular order of business was taken up, and Mr. Dumont moved that as the election bills had not been presented in a manner specified by law, that the Corporation Counsel be instructed to give his opinion in the matter and that the election of officers be instructed accordingly so that they can render their bills properly.

Street Commissioner Meeker reported that he had granted three sewer permits.

The Plainfield Sanitary Company asked through its president, John W. Murray, Sr., for permission to erect in the city a suitable building, as a garbage disposal plant, and the matter was referred to the street committee.

Mr. Marsh, in a communication, gave his opinion regarding the proposed transition from a third to a second-class city. He thought that as certain laws affecting second-class cities would be changed soon after the meeting of the Legislature in January, it would be unwise for the Council to take any steps at present in the matter. His opinion regarding the adoption of a method whereby back taxes can be collected, was in the line of instruction as to how the Martin act could be applied to this city. That could be done by the proper application to the Circuit Court for the appointment of three freeholders as commissioners, who would examine into the city's affairs and proceed according to the above act.

Mr. Barrows moved that the position of Mr. Marsh's opinion referring to a second class city be filed and that the portion relating to the collection of back taxes be referred to the incoming Council.

City Judge DeMeza's report showed that during the year 658 persons had been brought before him. Of that number, 108 were committed, 219 fined, 250 sentence suspended, 72 discharged and 9 were untried. The receipts from fines amounted to $1,291, and the expenses $236.60, which leaves a balance paid to the city treasurer of $1,054.40.

The street commissioner's report was received and referred to the street committee.

The report of the committee on taxation recently appointed, and of which Mr. Frost is chairman, was received and proved to be of great interest. It shows that there is $12,600,000 taxable property in the city, divided into wards as follows: First ward, $1,685,187; Second ward, $2,194,488; Third ward, $1,887,819; Fourth ward, $1,764,995. Of these amounts, $3,312,200 is real estate, $650,186 personal property and $853,644 is exempt, leaving a net balace of $3,378,675. At the rate of $2.30 per 100 the First and Second wards pay $91,143 and the Third and Fourth wards, $86,244. There is exempt $2 800.25. The area of the city is 3,838 acres or six square miles and there is the following number of acres in each ward: First ward, 810; Second ward, 1,322; Third ward, 931; Fourth ward, 775. In the business portion of the city there is 64 acres, assessed $1,278,600, which is one-sixth the total assessment.

Mr. Frost recommended that the above report be referred to the incoming Council and it was so ordered.

The bond of Collector-elect Elias H. Bird was received. The amount is $25,000 and the names of Otis Jenkins, J. H. Tier, Sr., Morgan C. Bird, Henry Liefke and Jacob Voehl appear as bondsmen. The bond was referred to the corporation council for examination as to proper form, etc.

The same course was adopted with the bond of Constable G. B. Rockfellow for $1,000, bearing the names of Henry Liefke and George Cole.

Owing to error the city has been paying taxes on a lot, No. 739 East Second street, and the $21 now due was ordered refunded and the assessment made to the proper owner, who is an out-of-town man.

Regarding the bill of Collector Johnson for legal services rendered by Reed & Coddington for $250 and H. V. Lindabury for $35, Mr. Dumont thought it best to settle the matter by paying the former. The latter bill of expenses, he stated, was incurred previous to the suit between Johnson and E. H. Bird and was not in the expenses of litigation. He thought that Mr. Johnson could collect the $250 through an action and he moved that the bill of $250 be paid, provided the city receive a voucher as a receipt for all claims from Mr. Johnson. The motion was adopted.

Mr. Dumont stated that owing to the extreme cold weather it was found necessary to purchase ten pairs of trousers for the policemen at an expense of $60, and he asked that the Council confirm the action of the committee, which was so ordered.

Mr. Fisk asked that the street committee be given an appropriation of $367.11 to cover the expenses relative to the work caused by the recent snow storms. The appropriation was granted.

Mr. Barrows chairman of the special committee appointed to investigate the matter of buying property and erecting a municipal building, reported for the committee that in their best judgment it was deemed advisable to secure the property and erect such building at once, and it was recommended that all city offices, jail, courtroom, etc., be combined in said building. A resolution was adopted that steps be taken to purchase the property and erect such a building.

Mr. Dumont moved that $4,000 be borrowed for four months on account of sewer work, and the motion was adopted.

Mr. Fisk moved that when the Council adjourned it be to meet Saturday evening, January 23, 1897, at which time all the business of the old Council will be concluded.

In connection with the above Mr. Dumont stated that he would call up the Madison avenue commissioners report at that time, as he thought the present Council should do something definite with the report. The Council then adjourned.

THE ASBESTOS' BIG TIME

THE OLD TIMERS ENJOY A CHRISTMAS TREE AND ITS ADJUNCTS.

Presents of a Juvenile Nature for Those Who Are the Grandfathers of Plainfield, and Wonderfully Appropriate They Were

There were great times up in the Asbestos Club rooms Friday afternoon, for it was then that the members of that wonderful organization celebrated Christmas after their fashion and bestowed little gifts on each other in remembrance of the day.

A colored man had been hired to procure a Christmas tree in which the gifts were to be hung, but, after waiting vainly for him to appear, the members decided that he had gone to sleep and the president and the janitor sallied forth to get one of their own account. Their experiences were sufficient to keep the other members talking for a week, but they found one at last. It was smaller than they had wanted but they made up in gifts for what they lacked in tree.

There were far too many gifts to hang on the tree so most of them were piled in a corner in the back room to await the time when they should be distributed. There was a keg of sweet cider in the back room also, so there were lots of visitors there.

A grand display of candy, fruits, and other good things was to be found in the front room and members and their friends, who came up to see the wonderful proceedings of this remarkable club, partook heartily of what was there. The Christmas tree occupied one corner of this same room and was decorated for the occasion in the most elaborate style. Some of the decorations referred to the evolution of the members of this club who "Will not burn," and were consequently all the more enjoyed.

There was the usual gathering of members in the afternoon and dominoes was played in all its glory. One after another the other members dropped in until soon after four o'clock most of them had assembled. The proceedings opened with a zither solo by J. Van Eps and then every body prepared for a speech by F. M. Bacon. His remarks were appropriate to the occasion and were listened to with close attention and lots of laugher by the others. Then the gifts were brought in and the presentation began. Mr. Bacon continued in the office of master of ceremonies and presented the gifts and read the little poetical selections that accompanied most of them. While the selections, most of which was written for the occasion, were remarkable, the gifts were more so. There was a tin sword for one warlike member. A talkative member received a horn which he blew as an accompaniment to the shouts of the rest. A paper-machie jackass and a miniature bail of hay was received by another whose equine had recently departed to a better land. One member, who had expressed a wish for a cat, received two of them made of the same material as the mule. There were lots of other presents too numerous to mention.

The picture of "The Klub inn Seshon" was exhibited and it certainly was a work of art. It was the work of one of the members and is his masterpiece. Some of the likenesses were very striking even to the stranger.

Other good times followed the gifts and all the members returned to their homes very thankful that they had been there.

A PRESENT FOR MR. LEAL.

Christmas Gifts For All the Instructors in Leal's School.

Prof. John Leal's school closed for the Christmas holidays Wednesday and special exercises were held in the morning. There were orations by A. I. Martine, Jr., Henry Leal and Carroll Knox. Remarks were made appropriate to the day by Profs. Leal, Smith and Heiss. Then a committee of three from the school, consisting of Messrs. Bull, White and Miller, presented gifts to all the teachers from the boys of the school. The present to Mr. Leal was the Standard Dictionary and the other gifts were all very handsome. Even Janitor Johnson was not forgotten and came in for his share of the Christmas.

The Junior department held special exercises also. They consisted of recitations by Wickam Corwin, Richard Lovell, Joseph Sherman, Harold Brown and Percy Brown. The programme ended with a tableau entitled "The Courtship of Miles Standish." Hugh G. Baldwin took the part of "Priscilla" and Story Rowland of "John Alden."

Presidential Guessing.

In the Presidential guessing contest, held by the Grand Union Tea Company of West Front street, the prizes have been awarded. The contest was to guess the total of McKinley's popular vote which is now announced to be 7,100,480. The first prize was won by Charles E. Wood, of North Branch, who guessed 7,108,948. The second prize went to Miss Julia Philpott, of 457 West Front street, whose guess was 7,101,203.

COWS CAUSE A LAWSUIT.

MRS. LYONS SAYS THEY TRESPASSED AND DAMAGED HER PROPERTY.

The Milk Producers Are Owned by Frederick Johansen—The Testimony Heard by a Horde of Mt. Bethel Agriculturists.

Mount Bethel had all the excitement of a suit at law for damages on Thursday afternoon and it brought the people from miles around. The case was tried in the Mt. Bethel hall so as to accommodate the crowd that wanted to see the fun. The case was that of Mrs. Cordelia Lyon vs. Frederick Johansen, in tort, and it was heard before Justice Austin and a jury of twelve men. Mrs. Lyon lives in the neighborhood of Scotch Plains where she owns a farm. Mr. Johansen has a farm near Smalleytown and he also is owner of a number of cattle. One day, so the plaintiff claimed, these same cows wandered over her property and did considerable damage thereto. The suit followed.

The audience was about evenly divided in its opinions and listened to the case with much interest. Winfield S. Angleman, of this city, represented the plaintiff while B. S. Swackhamer acted as lawyer for the owner of the cows. It took nearly all the afternoon to try the case and then the jury retired. They were out of the room about five minutes and then brought in a verdict of no cause for action.

AT THE EPISCOPAL CHURCHES.

Yesterday the Occasion of the Rendition of Special Services.

At the church of the Holy Cross there was a finely rendered musical programme. The vestry choir of fifteen boys and eleven men sang with spirit under the direction of George Hosking, choir master. The anthems by Sullivan and Leslie were particularly well sung. A communion service by Eyre was particularly well rendered. Rev. T. Logan Murphy delivered an eloquent and instructive Christmas sermon. There was a large attendance at this service and many remained for communion. The greater part of the Christmas music will be repeated on Sunday afternoon at 4:30.

The regular Christmas services were held at the Grace P. E. church Friday and the interior of the church looked very pretty in its Christmas garb of green. The decorating was all done overhead and with the evergreen roping. The nave was hung with it for its entire length. The decorating was all done in angles instead of curves and the effect was very pretty. The chairman of the committee in charge of the decorating was N. Pendleton Rogers. The designs for the decorations were furnished by F. R. Stevens.

Wagon Struck by a Trolley Car.

Car No. 6 of the street railway ran into milkman Henry's wagon on Bonnie Brae street, near Arch's meat market, Friday morning, and made a wreck of the wagon. Mr. Henry was trying to drive off of the tracks, but his rig did not move fast enough and the car and wagon came together with a crash. The wagon was taken to Homan's carriage shop for repairs. There was no damage to the car and it is quite likely that the company will settle for the damages to the wagon.

Tried to Save Money.

A young man, who gave his name as Antonio Braughton, was arrested at the North Avenue station Wednesday by Sergeant Kiely and Roundsman Totten for stealing a ride on the midnight train. He was arraigned before City Judge DeMeza this morning and fined $2, which he paid. He said that he was trying to save money, but declared that hereafter he would pay his fare. He was a waiter and out of a position.

Suing the Railway Company.

About three months ago a trolley car ran into a rig owned by Mr. Slope, of West Front street, with the result of wrecking the wagon. The owner claimed that his horse was injured, as well as himself, and a few days ago Mr. Slape brought action against the street railway company in Justice Newcorn's court. The summons is returnable December 30th. The company will fight the case, which no doubt will be an interesting one.

Union Watch Meeting.

The Christian Endeavor Societies of this city will hold a union watch meeting at the Seventh Day Baptist church on New Year's Eve, next Thursday evening. The social hour will begin at nine o'clock and the meeting at 10.30 o'clock. E. E. Anthony will be the leader.

To Furnish the Nurses Home.

A meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary Board of the Muhlenberg hospital was held Saturday and it was decided that the members would endeavor to furnish the nurses' home. Each member is to raise $2 or more.

From Manager to Proprietor.

Richard Menzel, who has been for some time manager of F. S. Taylor's music store in the Schepflin block on West Front street, has purchased the business and will take possession on January 1st.

LEFT FAMILY DESTITUTE.

CHARLES SNYDER WOULD NOT PROVIDE FOR WIFE AND CHILDREN.

At the Instigation of the Overseer of the Poor He Is Arrested—Says He Could Not Get Along With His Wife.

Charles Snyder, the story of the destitute condition of whose wife was exclusively told in the Daily Press some time ago, was arrested Friday. It was not a particularly merry Christmas for him; neither was it for the family up in their cold bare rooms on West Third street. The charge against Snyder was for non-support of his wife. It was brought through the intervention of Mrs. Snyder's landlord, who would not turn her out in the cold because she did not pay her rent until she had some place to go. He brought the matter to the attention of Overseer of the Poor Marx and wanted the latter to take care of the wife and the two children.

Mr. Marx did not care to burden the city with them when the husband and father was living and so the suit was started in the city court. Mrs. Snyder had declared that she received no aid from her husband and he had told her landlord, James Wilkinson, that he would do nothing more for them. A warrant has been out for the arrest of Charles Snyder for several days, but it was not until yesterday that he came into Plainfield where he could be arrested. Snyder was formerly employed in the street cleaning department of the city, but when the appropriation for that department ran out, he accepted a position on the farm of Mr. Blackford at South Plainfield, where he has been ever since.

He was locked up for over Christmas night and this morning he was arraigned before City Judge DeMeza. He pleaded not guilty and said he could prove by the grocer that he had been paying something for the support of his family. His reason for leaving them is said to be on account of his wife's queer actions. He was released under bonds for trial this afternoon.

KRIS KRINGLE WAS ON HAND.

A Crain Place Boarding House Welcomed the Old Patriarch.

Christmas at Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Harned, 19 Craig place, will long be remembered by those who participated in the pleasures there, which commenced by the distribution of gifts with which the large and beautiful Christmas tree was loaded.

Santa Claus was most admirably represented by Rev. A. Johnson, who was kept busy for an hour or more, with two assistants, in handing out the presents of which there were about 160 exchanged after the distribution of gifts. Several of those who participated were obliged to leave for different scenes, but their places were soon filled by others, there being many callers during the day. Among those present were: Ex-Mayor and Mrs. H. E. Needham, Miss Bertha Needham, Miss Alice Needham, F. H. Van Winkle, Sr., F. H. Van Winkle, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Whitney, the Misses Whitney, Rev. and Mrs. G. W. Smith, the Misses Smith, Rev. and Mrs. H. J. Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Vail and sons, the Misses Vail, Mrs. Sarah Line, Mr. and Mrs. Will F. Williams, Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Harned, of Plainfield, Harold Needham, of New York, Rev. and Mrs. Charles Scudder, of Newark.

Miantonomah's New Officers.

The following officers were elected at the meeting of Miantonomah Tribe No. 118, I. O. R. M., held last Friday Prophet, Mr. Lee; Sachem, David Bourning; Senior Sagamore, R. Slorah; Junior Sagamore, J. Cashmore; Chief of Records, C. E. Holstein; Collector of Wampum, A. J. Stiglitz; Keeper of Wampum, Wm. A. Westphal. The officers will be installed Friday evening, January 8th, and the exercises will probably be public.

Presented With a Gold Badge.

The generosity of Borough Mayor B. A. Hegeman, Jr., was shown in an appreciable manner Friday when he presented Chief Marshal Wm. Wilson with a handsome gold badge bearing the words "Chief Marshal North Plainfield." It bears also the State Coat of Arms. The gift gives evidence that the officer's services are appriciated.

Nothing Succeeds Like Success.

Miss Lincoln, the Park avenue florist, had the largest holiday trade the past week that she has ever had, the store being thronged with the finest of Plainfield people. The best of stock and courteous attention is always found at her establishment which is appreciated by her patrons.

He's Always in Demand.

Sam Frazee, the veteran violinist of this city, is always in demand. Wednesday night he played for a party of some 75 couples at Lebanon given by Mr. and Mrs. Sandford Groendyke, at Lebanon.

A Nice Profit.

The bazaar and fair for the benefit of the Fillmore avenue Baptist church, which has been in progress in Reform hall for several days past, netted the church about $75 clear gain.

MERRY CHRISTMAS SURE

NEARLY ALL THE WORLD HAD A HOLIDAY TIME OF IT.

It Was the Most Delightful in a Weather Way for Several Years and Young People the Most of It.

It has been many years since Plainfield has seen such a Christmas as Friday was as far as the weather was concerned. It was simply delightful, the kind you read about. First, there was the snow. It was the first real "white Christmas" that has visited this neighborhood for many years, for the ground was covered with several inches of glistening snow, over which the jingling sleigh bells sounded merrily indeed. Cutters, two-seated and sleighs of all descriptions, were out gliding over the icy surface of the macadamized roads.

The weather itself was of the real Christmas kind, clear and bracing, and it infused new life into the pedestrians as they stepped along with a cheery "Merry Christmas" greeting them on every side. There are some people so soured by their contact with the world that they don't believe in being happy on Christmas Day, but they were few and far between yesterday. The pessimistic old people who love to tell how the green Christmas makes a fat graveyard and then prophesy all sorts of mournful things for the next year, had nothing to say this time and could only comment on the wickedness of the world.

The skating was good, particularly on New Market pond. There was a big crowd there in the morning but in the afternoon it was double. The snow had been swept off and the ice was quite smooth. Everybody in New Market was down at the pond, and Dunellen sent a big delegation over. Every train and trolley car that came from Plainfield to Dunellen brought a big crowd of young people all ready for skating.

The coasting on Broadway and the Rahway hills was not good. There were a few out in the morning to try, but they soon left and the young people who had a pair of skates or could borrow a pair were out on the ice. The other outlying ponds were well filled and skating seemed to divide the honors of the day with the sleighing, which was good on macadamized roads.

CHRISTMAS TREE CAUGHT FIRE.

Children Tried to Light the Candles With Serious Results.

A serious conflagration was narrowly averted at the home of Samuel T. Hand, 124 Elmwood place, Friday afternoon. A large Christmas tree had been placed in the parlor for the children's amusement, and contrary to the expressed desire of the parents, the former lighted the candles. While doing this the tree caught fire and in an instant the room was filled with smoke. Mrs. Hand hastily secured some water and threw it on the tree, but this failed to extinguish the flames. Charles Conover, who lives on the opposite side of the street, was attracted by the dense smoke and he rendered valuable assistance by getting the tree out of the house. As a result of the fire the carpet, several rugs and a number of Christmas presents were ruined. The wall paper near the tree was also ruined and several panes of glass were cracked.

It was sometime before the smoke left the house.

THIS WHEEL WOULDN'T TURN.

An Accident to the Chemical Engine on Thursday.

An alarm of fire sent in from Box 23, East Fifth street and Franklin place, by E. C. Mulford, called the department apparatus to Samuel Bolden's house on East Fourth street, Thursday afternoon, about 5 o'clock.

The occupants of the house had started a wood fire in the kitchen stove, and from this the chimney caught fire. The firemen arrived just in time to avert a serious fire.

While the chemical engine was going to the fire, it was noticed by Second Assistant Chief J. W. Murray, who was on the apparatus, that one of the rear wheels refused to go around and when they returned to headquarters the wheel was examined. With a great deal of difficulty the wheel was removed, when it was learned that some foreign substance had caused the wheel to cut the axle. "Ted" Flannery, the department blacksmith, was sent for and he quickly repaired the axle. This accident was similar to one which occurred to the chemical soon after it was received.

A Happy Marriage.

Isaac P. Runyon, of this city, and Miss Addie Henry, of Piuckamin, were united in marriage last Wednesday evening at the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Henry, A number of the friends of the couple were present, and the ceremony was a very happy one. Several were present from this city. The couple went on a short trip. They will reside in this city after a time.

John T. Bolsterli, of West End Park, spent Christmas with his parents in Somerset cotnty.

SCHOLARS MADE HAPPY.

SUNDAY-SCHOOLS OF THE GERMAN CHURCHES HAVE THEIR CHRISTMAS.

An Appropriate Programme Opened the Event and This Was Succeeded by Gifts Being Presented to the Children.

St. Peter's German Lutheran church presented an attractive appearance Friday when the Sunday-school scholars enjoyed the Christmas entertainment. The church was prettily decorated with greens, while a handsome tree added greatly to the pleasure of all.

There was singing by the congregation and Sunday-school, after which the following scholars gave recitations: George Smith, Jens Claussen, Herman Glaentzer, Ida Borsum, Martha Hoppen, Gussie Carmen, Lena Bremmer, Emily Bremmer, Edith Kreutzfeld, Gustav Meisner, Carrie Sutterlein, Otto Reppert, Tillie Coddington, Lulia Ruppert, Annie Hentschen, Lottie Bremmer, Herman Klinsman, Joseph Stenzenberger, Lillie Stenzenberger, Henry Ruppert, Etta Ehel, Hedvig Grotmann, Eddie Schaller, Pauline Smith, Trude Richter.

The pastor, Rev. Mr. Klonka, then made an excellent address suitable to the occasion.

This was followed by the presentation of oranges, nuts, candy and a silk muffler to every scholar present. Mr. Klonka was handsomely remembered, and in addition to receiving a purse of money, he was the recipient of many useful articles. One elegant present was a valuable collection of butterflies, richly mounted and framed. The celebration this year was the most successful one ever held.

The scholars of the German Reformed Sunday school had a most enjoyable Christmas celebration Friday. The exercises were opened with a Christmas carol by the school, after which Rev. George Hauser, the pastor, offered prayer and made a few appropriate remarks.

A Christmas address by Frank Bach was followed with excellent recitations by the following scholars: Charles Doeringer, Russell Doeringer, Edna Conde, Eva Doeringer, Willie Newmiller, Etta Krausse, Fred, Krausse, Charles Hauser, Ida Hauser, Nellie Ballantine, Walter Conde, Carrie Beehtle, Lucy Caspar, Anna Bach, Willie Gaub, Augustus Neher, Anna Richter, Hugh Gray, Rose Sutterlein, Amelia Conde, Amelia Sutterlein, Wm. Beehtle, Carrie Bendes, Ella Hoerster, Henry Bentler, Laura Ballantine.

Mrs. Bach, on behalf of the Ladies' Aid Society of the church, surprised the pastor by presenting him with a purse of money, which he accepted with a few well chosen words in response. The committee in charge, consisting of Rev. Mr. Hauser, A. Wolf and Mrs. Stahl, distributed gifts to the scholars. There were books, oranges, toys and candy, and every one was made glad by receiving a present.

The usual Christmas tree, gayly decorated and brilliantly illuminated, was a source of great pleasure to all especially the younger scholars.

TOOK A WIFE CHRISTMAS EVE.

Cupid Makes a Present That Will Last Till Death Does Part.

The marriage of Miss Bertha Mason and George P. Schaefer, both of this city, was celebrated Christmas Eve, at the home of the groom 407 West Second street.

The officiating clergyman was J. O. McKelvey, pastor of Warren Chapel. The bride looked charming in white silk, trimmed with white lace, while the bridemaid, Miss Susie Schaefer, sister of the groom, wore a gown of blue silk trimmed with white lace.

Thomas Schaefer, brother of the groom, acted as best man. The house was prettily decorated with greens and holly, and the bridal party stood under a bower of flowers during the ceremony.

A reception followed which was attended by guests from Asbury Park, Philadelphia, Trenton and Plainfield. The presents were numerous and useful.

Mr. and Mrs. Schaefer will reside at 407 West Second street. Mr. Schaefer is an employe of C. M. Raybert, the North avenue plumber.

Depositions Taken.

Depositions were taken Saturday before Attorney Harry C. Runyon, master in chancery, with a view of reopening the appeal case of Dartland vs. Ellis, on contract. Ex-Judge William A. Coddington was present for the plaintiff and S. S. Swackhamer for the other side.

The Milkman Settled.

The trouble between the Plainfield Street railway and the milkman has settled. The case came up in the city court Saturday and Judge DeMeza pronounced Paul Henley, the milkman, guilty and fined him $8 for disturbing the peace, quarreling and fighting and blocking the roadway.

After the Holidays.

Plainfield Business College will run day and night from January 4th to July 1st.

DANCED CHRISTMAS

A HAPPY AFFAIR HELD AT THE [illegible] CLUB THURSDAY NIGHT.

Their Event Conducted by the Junior Member of the Club Whose Dash in Originality and Sociability Are Well Known.

Everybody was home from college and boarding school but there was a junior dance arranged at the Park Club. The young people of the set mourned over the fact until two of the young ladies suggested a subscription dance, and, with characteristic Park Club energy, successfully carried out their plans. The dance was held in the hall of the club on Christmas Day Thursday night, and a more enjoyable affair has not been held at the Park Club. Of course there was to be the annual Senior dance on New Year's Day, but the Juniors felt that they could not let this opportunity pass.

The patronesses were Mrs. Frank Sergeant Grant and Mrs. F. O. Bell. The dance was arranged by Miss Edith Clapp, Miss Adelaide Bell and the Junior committee, and the joint hands in their efforts to make the affair a success. The club house never looked prettier than in its dress of evergreen and holly, arranged especially for the occasion by the generous hand of Janitor Israel Jones.

Among those present were the Misses May Waring, Florence Waring, Emma Schoonmaker, Gertrude Stevens, Nancy Lawson, Maud Middledith, Ada Smock, Alice Barker, Edith Clapp, Adelaide Bell, Katheryn Bell, Sarah Bell, Genevieve Daniel, Hallie Van Deventer, Eleanor Van Deventer, Helen Clark, Bertha Crane and the Misses Shreve, the Misses Case, Tyler, Van Buren, Goddard Place, Schoonmaker, Lowe, Runyon, Rushmore, Middledith, Kirkner, McGee, Peck, Taylor, Fish, Hall, Leland, Long, Wilson, Dupee, Cook, Faber, Brown, Wells and Frost.

O'ER THE SNOW TO A GOOD TIME.

A Straw Ride and a Dance Make Up an Evening's Pleasure.

Last Thursday George Voehl and Messrs. Sebring and Kulp, of the borough, gave the services of their handsome horses and sleighs to their friends, and at 7 o'clock a merry crowd of people left the corner of Craig place and Duer street for Stoney Hill, the home of Frank Hyers. The sound of fog horns and jingling bells made by the merry folks helped to enliven the trip both ways.

When the destination was reached, the crowd took possession of the house, and Prof. Frazee with his violin was in the party, and with others also made those dance who needed dancing before. "Uncle Jack" Carson was present and he told how potatoes were raised on Stony Hill and he advised all to buy farms there. Refreshments were served in abundance and at an early hour the guests left for home after wishing Mr. and Mrs. Haynes many returns of the day. On the return home the party amused themselves by arousing all the farmers on the road with the singing of popular songs, and thus a very merry Christmas day was passed.

CHRISTMAS ENDEAVOR SERVICE

A Helpful Meeting at Trinity Reformed Church Yesterday.

Those who remained away from the Christian Endeavor Christmas service held in Trinity Reformed church, Friday morning, missed a great blessing for, though the attendance was not large, the service was one of deep spiritual interest.

Henry Crane, president of the First Baptist church Christian Endeavor society, had charge of the meeting, and he gave a helpful talk appropriate to the occasion.

Horace J. Martin led the singing, which was a feature. He also sang a beautiful solo.

The testimonies and prayers offered were a source of strength and encouragement to all present.

The service closed with the Misses benediction and a prayer by Rev. Mr. Main, pastor of the Seventh-Day Baptist church.

E. E. Anthony announced that a watch-night service would be held New Year's Eve in the Seventh-Day church, and he urged all to attend and to bring their pastors with him.

Married a Quarter of a Century.

Mr. and Mrs. George Rosenberg, of Chatham street, celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of their marriage in a most auspicious manner. There were about fifty guests from Plainfield, Newark and New York. An exceedingly large collection of silver was received by the bride and groom. The supper was complete in every detail and thoroughly enjoyed by all. It was Saturday morning when the guests left for their homes and they wished the bride and groom many happy returns of the day.

More Hackmen in Trouble.

Another hackmen's disturbance was called to the attention of City Judge DeMeza Saturday. Peter Seader, a hackman, was charged by Fred Friese, another hackman, with blocking up the driveway in front of the North avenue station with his hack. Seader pleaded not guilty and his trial was set down for Saturday morning.

VISIT OF SANTA CLAUS.

THE OLD FELLOW WELCOMED TO MONROE AVENUE CHAPEL.

Walter McGee Impersonated the Character of Santa and Captured the Hearts of the Little Ones—Other Participants.

The Christmas entertainment at the Monroe Avenue Chapel Wednesday, was one of delight and pleasure to the large number of people present. The exercises opened with singing by the school under the direction of Superintendent Walter McGee.

The primary department, in charge of Miss Haff, entertained the older folks with recitations and the rendition of several songs. After the school sang "Merry, Merry Bells." an amusing cantata, entitled "The Capture of Santa Claus," was given in an excel lent manner.

The platform was artistically decorated with evergreens, while an old-fashioned fire-place was given a prominent place. Overhanging the platform was a large stand of evergreens studded with incandescent lights, the work of Henry Apgar.

Walter McGee played the part of Santa Claus in a characteristic manner, while Steven Aldrich took the part of the "Snow Man." The fairies were Irene Aldrich, Clara Scribner, Emma Scribner, Marguerite Phillips, Wenona Dodds, Minnie Guntzman, and those who captured Santa Claus were Etta Randolph, Sophia Saums, Edith Robinson, Vaughn McGee, Albert Cowling, Alice Pugh and Geo. Whitely. The chimney tree were Ephraim Saums, Arthur Robinson, Arthur Dow, Wm. Mattox, Agnus Dodds and Sidney Gilbert.

The young folks thought it would be a good scheme to capture Santa Claus when he arrived and instead of being asleep as he thought, they were wide awake. When he came down the chimney they caught him and fastened him in a chain with a rope.

During all this appropriate songs were rendered by the fairies and elves. An amusing feature happened when Santa called for his pie, which was a red apple and read. It was brought in a basket and when un covered proved to be Ina Dodds and Florence Phillips. Before they were taken away they sung a pretty little song. "Jack Frost," and the "Snow Man" also made their appearance and rendered solos. After the departure of Santa Claus, the school sang a Christmas carol. Candy and oranges were then distributed to all present. After which the festivities were brought to a close.

Miss Charlotte Aldrich and Miss Boodman were in charge and arranged the programme.

AMUSEMENTS OF WINTER

SKATING, SLEIGHING AND COASTING MUCH IN VLGUE NOW.

Young People Take Advantage of the Opportunities for Exhilirating Sport That the Cold Snap Affords—Some Straw Rides.

With the cold weather and the snow come the winter amusements, skating, sleighing and coasting. Where the snow has been brushed off the ice, the skating is good. The ice is thick and quite smooth and the young people, and some of the older ones too, have been spending their afternoons and evenings on the ice. Christmas day there were many out and Saturday also. New Market pond is in first rate condition and several parties of young people went from this city to that pond on Saturday afternoon and evening.

Straw rides have been frequent during the last week. The Misses Langdon, Wyckoff and Duffy, of this city, arranged a straw ride for Christmas night. There were thirteen in the party but it didn't seem to spoil the fun, for the ride was a very pleasant one. Then the party went to the home of the Misses Duffy, of Central avenue, where refreshments were served and a little dance held.

A gay party started from the home of Augustus VanDeventer on Willow avenue, on Saturday evening, and enjoyed a pleasant ride on the county road.

There were two straw rides that started from Dunellen on Saturday evening. One was gotten up by John Fisher and Charles Mattis and went out for a pleasurable ride on the county road. The other was a "stag" racket and was enjoyed by a number of the young men of that borough.

The coasting was fair on Broadway hill but the superior attractions of the skating kept many away. There were only a few of the young people on the hill on Saturday afternoon. They found the hill smooth and to bobs went down as far as the first street.

Less Smoke Than Anything Else.

Saturday evening, about 5:30, Councilman Fisk telephoned to fire headquarters and told those in charge that there was a chimney on fire at the home of Rev. C. L. Goodrich, at the corner of Seventh street and Madison avenue. Chief Doane and No. 2 hose wagon responded at once and learned that a wood fire had been started in an open fire-place, and for some reason it was thought that the chimney was on fire. A hand extinguisher was used and very quickly all danger was removed.

LIKELY TO CAUSE A ROW.

BILLBOARD AND STORES TO BE BUILT BETWEEN CHURCH AND HOTEL.

Revere House and All Souls' Church the Ones Most Interested—Justice Nash the Owner Who Intends to Put Up Structures.

There is something of a surprise in store for the residents on Park avenue, and not a particularly pleasant one either. There is a little strip of land on that thoroughfare, seventy-five feet long, running from the driveway of the Revere House to within six feet of the All Souls' church, and 11 feet deep at the latter end, gradually an rowing up to nothing at the other. Justice Vincent W. Nash has purchased this strip of land and declares his intention of building two little two-story stores on half the property and a bill board on the rest. The work of excavating for the foundations, he told a Press reporter yesterday after noon, will be started at once.

That strip of ground has quite a history. It happened to be in that shape by the cutting through of Park avenue which did not run parallel with the dividing line between the two farms that were then located there. This strip belonged to the Spencer estate and was owned by the late Mrs. Spencer, of Park avenue. There was an old fence that separated it from the lawn on the side of the Revere House, then the Park House, and it was not a piece of architectual beauty in its way. That was about fifty years ago. The boarders at the Park House did not like its appearance and one evening held a meeting in one of the parlors. Something was decided and the fence disappeared during the night. Job Male purchased the property and, at his death, it went into the possession of John Delaney, of Third place, by will of the former.

The Revere House and the property adjoining belongs jointly to the Van-Deventer and Stelle estates, the former owning three-fifths, and the latter two-fifths. They are represented by Augustus J. Bronson, of the borough, who is now in the law offices of Richard V. Lindabury, of Elizabeth. Some time ago Mr. Delaney offered to sell Mr. Bronson the property in question but at what the latter considered an exorbitant price. Mr. Bronson refused to buy it and a high board fence was erected on the property, which suddenly collapsed fifteen minutes after the carpenters left it. Some people said it was the wind that blew it down.

After a time Mr. Delaney offered the property to George B. DeRevere, the lessee of the Revere House, at a much more reasonable price, and the latter considered the matter. Last Saturday Mr. De Revere went to see the owner of the land only to learn that Mr. DeLaney had just sold it to Justice Nash. Mr. DeRevere went to see the latter, but was informed that the property would not be sold even for $2,000.

Justice Nash's plans, as already mentioned, are to build two stores at the larger end of the property, one 18 feet long and the other 20 feet long. They are to be one story frame structures with, of course, only one room. The remaining 37 feet will be devoted to a bill board, ten feet high.

Of course, there will be opposition. The residents of that vicinity will not allow the proposed stores and bill board to be erected without a fight. The stores, which will be close to the side walk, will run to within six feet of the All Souls church, effectually cutting off their view and from them is likely to come lots of opposition. What steps will be taken to prevent, if possible, the carrying out of Justice Nash's plans remains to be seen.

PARK CLUB LOST BY ONE TRICK

Failed to Wrest the Whist Championship From the Bostons.

The eleventh match of the season for the American Whist League trophy was played at Boston on Saturday between the American Whist Club, of Boston, holders, and the Park Club, of this city, challengers. The contest was won by the Bostonians by the score of eighteen tricks to seventeen. It was the closest match of the season. The teams were:

American Whist Club—L. M. Bouve, C. L. Recker, W. S. Fenellosa and H. H. Ward.

Park Club—G. P. Rogers, S. St. J. McCutchen, J. B. Howell and Samuel Townsend.

The Park Club has twice held the trophy, defeating the Hamiltons and the Philadelphia Whist Club in two matches in March, 1895. Then the Parks lost to Albany. Last November the Jerseymen challenged the Hamiltons, but were defeated by sixteen tricks.

Taken to Jamesburg.

Saturday morning Charles Milligan and Louis Wilson, the lads who recently committed the robbery in this city, and who were committed to the Reform School were taken to that institution by Sheriff Kirk and Warden Blore. The boys were neatly attired in fine clothing and wore russet shoes and fedora hats. One of the boys received a package of Christmas gifts from his mother, but seemed to manifest no particular interest in its reception.

STOLE A RIDE, AND FELL

PE ER OLSON JOLTED FROM OFF THE TOP OF A BOX CAR.

The Train Was Passing the North Avenue Station When the Accident Occurred—His Money Gave Out at Bound Brook.

Peter Olson, formerly known in this city, nearly lost his life Wednesday about 11.30. He had come from Jenkinstown, Pa., to Bound Brook, on a passenger train, and his money having run out, he attempted to steal a ride from the latter place to New York on a freight train. When near Plainfield a sudden jar of the train caused him to lose his balance and he fell off of the top of the car while the train was moving at a rapid rate of speed. Patrolman Totten happened to be near the North Avenue station where the accident occurred, and he ran to the assistance of the unfortunate man. It was soon learned that Olson was suffering from serious injuries. The ambulance was called and Olson was taken to the hospital where he is now under treatment.

His condition is not considered serious, though the extent of his injuries cannot yet be ascertained.

NIPPED NOSES AND EARS

JACK FROST LETS ALL KNOW THAT HE IS HEREABOUTS.

The Coldest Night of the Season, the Mercury in Thermometers Dropping to Zero Ice is Making Very Fast Just Now.

What a jolly time it was for Jack Frost Sunday night. The evening was clear and he looked out that it was clear enough. He nipped the noses and ears of the good people as they were coming home from church and played all his usual pranks. Then he chased the mercury around until it hid away under the zero mark and stayed there until Old Sol came out to drive away Jack Frost.

It was the coldest weather of the winter. Nobody doubted that when they woke up this morning. Even the visitors here from a colder climate have a wholesome respect for the Jack Frost of Plainfield. According to the self-registering thermometers in Weather Observer Naegle's yard and in front of Armstrong's pharmacy, the mercury fell just to the zero mark and there it stuck. In other thermometers the mercury fell below that point, in some as low as five degrees below. There was no wind and the air was nipping cold, and those that were out last evening had to keep moving to keep warm.

Of course, the skating was improved by the cold as was, too, the sleighing and it gave the people of Plainfield a taste of real winter.

Drawn and Taken.

The fourth entertainment of the Y. M. C. A. star course will be given New Year's night by S. M. Spedon, artist entertainer and caricaturist, of New York. Mr. Spedon is said to be unequaled in his particular line of work. Nothing else quite like it has ever been seen. One of the most novel, best and varied entertainments before the public. Something you ought to hear and see.

The Sleigh Overturned.

While one of Captain Hand's sleighs was conveying a party from Hope Chapel to the Crescent Avenue church Sunday afternoon, the vehicle turned too short at the corner of Central avenue and West Seventh street and the occupants were dumped in a promiscuous manner into a snow bank. The accident caused a good deal of excitement but no one was seriously hurt.

A Large Collection.

The Christmas collection at St. Mary's church amounted to $690, the largest ever contributed on that day in the history of the church.

Mrs. A. N. Adams and son, Fred Adams, of Netherwood, avenue, have returned home after spending several days with relatives in Orange.

THIS TALE IS OF A COAT

THE GARMENT, WITH VALUABLE PAPERS, MISSING.

Nicholas Terhune Left the Coat in a Room in His House Last Night—This Morning Gone Where No One Can Conjecture.

"The man with the iron mask" was not it with the mystery that surrounds the home of Nicholas Terhune, 36 Sandford avenue, and Mr. Terhune is greatly puzzled to know how to account for it.

Sometime during the night a valuable coat containing some exceedingly important papers, and a pair of cuffs, disappeared from a room on the first floor, Mr. Terhune left the coat and cuffs there on retiring, and when he came down stairs this morning they were gone. A long and persistent search did not disclose their identity, and Mr. Terhune is inclined to think that the articles took feet and walked away.

Not another thing was disturbed in the house, and there was not the slightest thing to indicate that anyone had been in the house, except that the articles above mentioned are missing.

Why Mr. Terhune returns this evening from New York he will continue the search.

YULETIDE AT ST. MARY'S

THE PAROCHIAL SCHOOL PUPILS PARTICIPATE IN SPECIAL EXERCISES.

The Programme Made up of Musical and Literary Efforts in Which the Participants Acquited Themselves Creditable.

St. Mary's Parochial School Hall was filled with a large and delighted audience Wednesday afternoon when the annual Christmas celebration was held. It was undoubtedly the best entertainment ever given and the whole affair was a great success. The programme opened with a song by the school, entitled "O Holy Night," which was given with precision and excellence. This was followed with a recitation, "The Orphan's Christmas," by Miss Elma Barrie, and she was given loud applause. A vocal solo, "Please Mr. Santa Claus Don't Forget Me," by Thomas Mack, won hearty commendation.

The next number was a doll drill given by twenty-five girls. The drill throughout was excellent and every movement was made with grace and skill. "Christmas Chimes" was heartily sung by the school.

The recitation, "Christmas Night at the Quarters," was given by Miss Josephine Murphy, and she was accorded great applause.

One of the best numbers was a vocal solo and character sketch 'I'd Like to be Like Grandma," by Miss Catharine Hilling. The young woman took her part in an exceptionally clever manner and her singing was a marked feature.

"A Frolic with the Brownies in the Snow" was the next number, and it was the best one on the programme. The spirit and enthusiasm with which the young folks entered into this part was a pleasure to all. The dancing and various movements were very pretty and outbursts of applause were frequently heard.

The finale furnished an exceedingly pretty scene, as the boys and girls were snowballing each other with balls of cotton, while thousands of bits of paper were flying through the air to represent snow.

This was followed by the announcement that Thomas Schaefer would entertain those present with selections on his phonograph. The various selections given were very fine, and the able manner in which Mr. Schaefer handled his machine, won for him many praises. Father Smyth spoke down on the programme for an address, but he omitted it and only made a few congratulatory remarks.

The programme closed with the singing of "Adeste Fidelis," by the school.

Too much cannot be said in praise of Mrs. Bartlett, who has worked earnestly and faithfully in drilling the scholars. Her work certainly reflected great credit for every scholar from the smallest to the largest, went through each movement without a break. Particular mention should also be given Sister Mary Esther and the other Sisters who have with untiring zeal worked for the best results.

Those who took the leading part in the frolic with the brownies were Miss Annie Daly, Miss Josephine Murphy, Miss Katherine Roach, Miss Lizzie Day and Miss Fannie Reed.

During the afternoon Miss Helen Sumbatoff, pianiste, rendered "Barcarole," by Mills, and a selection from Rubinstein.

Father Smyth, of Cranford, was no tified as a guest at the celebration.

Death of Mrs. Horton.

The death of Mrs. Horton, of Somerset street, widow of the late S. O Horton, occurred Sunday, after a long illness. She was in her eighty-fifth years, and had been growing feeble for sometime. A few months ago her son, Lester Horton, died. Mrs. Horton leaves two daughters, Mrs. Henry Clay Randolph and Mrs. Cory. The funeral was held from her late home at 2:30 o'clock Wednesday afternoon.

A WRECK-FATED SWITCH

THIRD ONE OCCURRED THIS MORNING AND SIX CARS DERAILED.

One Train Ran Into Another That Was Crossing the Track on Which the Former Was Running—No One Hurt in Collision.

The third freight wreck on the switch from the third to the first track, just east of the Washington avenue bridge, occurred Thursday at five o'clock when an east-bound fast freight on the main track crashed into the side of another east-bound freight train which was crossing from the third, or freight, track to the first, or main, track.

It was bitter cold and the crews of the three fast freight trains on their way from Mauch Chunk to Jersey City had to keep moving to avoid freezing. They were in a hurry, for the next day was Christmas and another train must be taken back to Mauch Chunk before they might go home to their families and spend Christmas. The train drawn by engine 413, with Engineer Charles Keck and Conductor William Seidel, was on the main track. The other two trains, one drawn by engine 406 and manned by Engineer Louis LaBarre and Conductor Will Arndt, and the other with engine 340 attached, were on the third track.

To make time, if possible, Conductor Seidel decided to go on the main track, not knowing that there was another train on that track and not far behind. It was then about five o'clock and still dark so that the train on the main track did not see the other one switching over on to the main track until they reached the North avenue station. The engineer whistled down brakes but it was to late to stop the train before it struck the other one. Conductor Seidel was in the cab at the time and he and Engineer Keck waited until the collison was sure and then both jumped. The train was not going very fast or else the damage would have been much more than it was. As it was five freight cars and an oil car were derailed, while the front and side of engine 413 was bent and broken. The cab was partially wrecked while the steam chest and cyclinder were somewhat damaged but not enough to injure them for use. The derailed cars were thrown from the track from ten to twenty feet but none were upset. They were slightly damaged, the sides of several being broken in places and the door of one torn off. Part of the contents of one car, which was loaded with barrels of oat meal, was scattered over the ground in the vicinity of the wreck. All the cars were loaded.

The wrecking train at Elizabethport was telegraphed for and arrived here soon after seven o'clock. The gang of men on board went to work at once and by 9:30 o'clock everything was cleared away.

The first and third tracks, which are the east bound passenger and freight tracks, were blocked by the wreck and the passenger traffic was somewhat delayed in consequence. As the 7:58 train had to take the west bound passenger track, track 2, the cars were not left in front of the station as usual but were brought down with the rest. That train was several minutes late as were all the regular trains until the tracks were cleared.

SHOT HIMSELF IN THE FOOT.

A Bound Brook Young Man Suffers a Serious Termination to a Hunt.

William Westerman, aged 19 years, a resident of Bound Brook, lies at the hospital in a condition that may compel him to lose his foot. Last Saturday afternoon Westerman went on the mountains back of Bound Brook, duck shooting. Accidentally his gun was discharged and the whole charge entered his foot. His cries attracted the attention of a friend, not far off and the latter ran to his assistance. The injured young man was finally brought to the Bound Brook station, and from there he came by train to the hospital where he is now under treatment.

As yet it is impossible to tell how serious his injuries are, as is always the case with a gun shot wound.

A Loss to Trinity Church.

The members and congregation of Trinity Reformed church were saddened Sunday by the announcement of the resignation on January 1st, of Mrs. H. E. Rider, the soprano singer in the choir. Mrs. Rider has sang very acceptably during her engagement, and her position will not easily be filled by the music committee.

Major Anderson Post Inspected.

The annual inspection of Major Anderson Post, No. 109, G. A. R., was held Saturday evening, at which time Assistant Department Inspector Hudson, of Kilpatrick Post, Elizabetport, officiated. The work was performed by Post 109 in a creditable manner and they were commended by the inspector.

MARRIED MEN WIN AGAIN

THE BENEDICTS DOWN THE BACHELORS OF THE PARK CLUB.

Single Fellows Cannot Down the Pins With the Constancy and Precision That Characterizes Their Opponents.

"Needles and pins,
Needles and pins,
When a man marries
His troubles begin."

So sang, or rather shouted, the Bachelors of the Park Club Saturday evening when their second bowling match with the Benedicts of that club was in progress. It did not do any good, however, for the second game resulted the same as the first, an overwhelming victory for the married men. Their very effective mascot, the "Yellow Kid," occupied his old position over the score-board and smiled at the Bachelors.

At first it seemed as if the single men were going to win, for they started off at a lively pace and began to increase their lead steadily up to the fourth frame, when they led by 87 pins. Some of the faces of the married men were very long, but the spritely Mayor of the borough and his Senatorial friend and neighbor did not lose courage and trusted in the still smiling "Yellow Kid." The ladies smiled on the "kids," as the married men called them, and all seemed well. Then in an unlucky moment one of the Bachelors thought of that old nursery rhyme given above, and the bowlers repeated it in mighty tones. That turned the tide and the ladies cast their smiles in another direction, while the pins seemed only too glad to tumble down for the Benedicts. The fifth frame was a wonderful one for the Benedicts, and they made strikes and spares in reckless profusion. The game grew more and more exciting. The married men were decreasing their opponents' lead rapidly and at the seventh frame were 46 pins in the lead.

The last three frames were remarkable for the poor bowling of the Bachelors and the phenomenal scores that their opponents put up. The windup was rather exciting on account of the last expiring effort of the Bachelors to overcome their opponents' lead. The effort was a brave one, but victory was not theirs. The Benedicts shouted and squealed in a most remarkable manner and wound up with giving three cheers for the "disconsolate Bachelors."

The teams lined up somewhat differently than they did the week before. The Benedicts were plus a Senator, while the Bachelors had lost their solitary public official, Councilman-elect Wm. N. Runyon. Matthews was out again in his famous white sweater and carried a rabbit's foot for good luck, but he threw it away before the game was over. McCutchen, the "Freshman from Yale," as they called him, rolled in his old-time form, and made the high score of the evening.

The individual scores were as follows:

Bachelors.		Benedicts.
Lyman	143	Sandford	198
Ralph	163	Randolph	208
Wilson	154	Thiers	236
Douglass	141	Runyon	191

An alarm of fire from Box 45, corner of Muhlenberg place and South Second street, Monday noon, calls the department to Michael Watson's place, corner of South Second street and Grant avenue, where a stove had set fire to the wainscoting and floor in the store. The alarm was sent in by Frank Fine with a key from Potter's Press Works. The boarders living over the store came to the rescue and extinguished the flames by the time the department arrived. Chief Doane was at the Pond Tool Works at the time and he rendered valuable assistance. The damage by fire was slight.

ADIEU TO MR. GILBERT.

spread out before them. There were some people now in their dotage who had an idea that the country was not as good as it was when they were in their prime. Time and age had given them a warped view, and as a matter of fact there was never a time when the citizens possessed a clearer conception of their duties to the Government than at present, as, he argued, had been shown in the recent campaign. It was the fault of some people that they lacked the spirit to progress, but this could not be charged to the vast majority. Mr. Fowler divided the existence of the nation into three great periods. First, the fight for National liberty and the right to rule; second, personal and political liberty; third, personal responsibility. The essential which makes our hope in a Nation, said the speaker, is the endeavor to make the home in which we live a little better than the one in which we were born. And so of city, State and Nation—the constant effort to uplift and make it better. The attitude of Plainfield's citizens in municipal affairs, he said, was an ennobling example in that direction.

Richard V. Lindabury was assigned to respond to the toast of "Our State," and he did in a capable manner. Mr. Lindabury said that the election of such men as Gilbert and Fisk explains why Plainfield is considered to have partially solved the problem of municipal government. And yet we could never had enjoyed the excellent administration that has been our privilege in city affairs if after election the representative citizens had left their Mayor without active support. It was this participation in public business of men like those in attendance at the dinner who had made it possible for Plainfield to possess such a government, and the speaker's wish was that all the cities of New Jersey might be like Plainfield. Coming down to the State, Mr. Lindabury said that there was many improvements needed in the organic laws. Legislative acts were too voluminous and too dense for a practical and economical government. Where a few years ago the statutes only covered one thousand pages they now filled four thousand and it was impossible for any officer, lawyer or citizen to understand them as they should be. In public life there was altogether too much extravagance with the finances on the part of office holders. These were evils, he said, that were injuring the fair name of New Jersey and if we retain our position as a State they must be remedied. We have an excellent foundation to work on as has been shown when the patriotism and good citizenship of the State had been appealed to and the people rallied to the ballot box and met the situation in an emphatic manner. He advised Plainfielders to act towards the State government with the same spirit as they do towards the city government, and then much good would be accomplished.

Mr. Lindabury was followed by Senator Foster Voorhees on "Our County." The Senator was in his best mood and in jest and practical thought gave such a talk as comes very acceptable after an indulgence in things that made up the menu. He remarked that he had always believed that "In Union there was strength," and especially so of Union county. But it seemed that he was mistaken, since there was so much talk of Plainfield taking leave. The rest of the county were going to insist, however, that she remain a part of Union for the rest of their life. It was the one of city in the county that was the most beautiful, most homelike and most progressive, far to progressive to lose. While the climate of the rest of the county was not of the best the salubrious atmosphere of the Eldorado of the East was far famed. Union is a county, he said, that always holds a welcome hand to all good people from other sections. The third county of the State, she has given more judges to the Supreme court and Chancellors than any other county in the State. Her citizens take pride in an economical administration of public affairs, and were one of the first to break away from the conditions that prevent progression, as was evidenced in the fact that Union county was the first to recognize the benefits of good roads in this section of the country and her liberality in this direction has served as an example for many others. It should be the endeavor of every one of her citizens to make the county possess such a fair name that when any one goes out to dwell elsewhere it will be their proud boast that they were born in Union county.

"Our City" gave Corporation Counsel Craig A. Marsh an opportunity to briefly and interestingly tell something of why the people take such an interest in municipal affairs. The people, he said, had been educated up to their present activity by a long line of citizens who had lent honor and credit to municipal affairs by personal participation in the affairs of government, and as time passed on this spirit seem to manifest itself to a still greater degree. And this active personal interest in the city has made it what it is. The machine political element has been eliminated from the administration and men of business standing and integrity fill its offices. Mr. Marsh closed in a glowing perioration of Mayor Gilbert's honesty and ability as the city chief executive for the past six years.

At this point William L. Saunders read the following poem composed by him for the occasion:

OUR GILBERT.

Way back in '66 he came,
The town was small and poor and tame.
And he a modest lad—his name,
A. Gilbert.

Our streets were rough, our lights were dim
The cops were cross and out of trim,
The firemen few and lacking vim,
O. Gilbert!

There was no town beneath the stars
So dry and slow as this of ours;
We longed for pipes and trolley cars,
And Gilbert.

He came—he reigned as Magistrate,
How things have changed since then of late:
Plainfield is now the pride of State,
With Gilbert.

His was the scythe that fell'd the six,
That ruled the town by acts and tricks;
He mowed in spite of politics,
This Gilbert.

With zealous care and exact zeal
He labored for the commonweal;
And heeded every just appeal
To Gilbert.

Long may he flourish, live and rise!
Long may we honor, love and prize
This servant, faithful, tireless wise,
Our Gilbert.

Though Wm. Brookfield, the eminent New York lawyer, who occupied a seat on the right of the guest of the evening, was not down for a toast, he was called on and made a few brief remarks. He has been a personal friend of Mayor Gilbert through all the latter's business career, and spoke eulogistically of him.

Then came the finale of the evening, the toast of "Ourselves," by S. St. John McCutchen, far famed for his quiet, infectious humor. The guests knew him and gave him an enthusiastic welcome in applause. Mr. McCutchen did not disappoint, for laughter reigned throughout his toast. His remarks were not along any particular line of thought, but were a bit here and a bit there. To be appreciated they had to be heard. At the outset Mr. McCutchen read a few rhymes with a humorous touch anent several of the distinguished guests. He brought down the house when he referred to Mayor-elect Fisk as "Little Cute Cupid." But in all his jocularity there ran the vein of light flattery and his toast was a happy ending to the evening.
